Perfess in the beginning of winter durit not go forth of the trontiers or Macedany, for fear left the Romans would invade with violence his realm in some place or other, if they found it void and disfurnished. But toward the mids of December about mid-winter, when by reason of the deep from the mountains are unpaffable and unsuperable from out of Theffaly, thinking he had then a fit featon and opportunity to cut off the hopes and break the hearts of the neighbor-borderers, that when he should be averted another way and buned in the Roman war, he might be I fecured of danger from them: confidering that from the parts of T bracia he had peace with Colvis and likewise from Epirus fide (by the means of Cephalus, who juddainly of late was revolted from the Romans:) moreover having newly vanquished the Dardanians in war; and feeing only that quarter to infelt and annoy Macedony, which regardeth and affronteth Illyricum; and that these Illyrians also were not quiet and at peace, but ready to give entrance unto the Romans; but ithe had subdued and tamed those Illyrians which were next unto him, then King Gentius also, who a long time hung between in doubtful terms, might be induced & drawn wholly into lociety with him: he reforved at length, and with ten thouland footmen heavily armed, whereof part were Phalangitæ, and other two thousand lightly appointed; and five hundred horse, he made a rode and presented his forces before Stubera: from whence after he had provided himself of corn to g ferve for many daies; and given order that the ordinance and engins of battery should follow after; at the third daies end he lodged neer Ufcana, the head City of all that Land Peneffia, But before that he offered any affault, he fent certain of purpote to found and follicit the affections one while of the Cartains of the garrison, and another while of the Townsmen. Now there by within the City, together with the manhood and youth of the Illyrians, a garrifon also of the Romans. And when he faw that they brought no news of any peaceable dealing from thence, he began to bend his forces against them, and affaid to invest them round about, and so to force the City. And albeit both night and day without any rest and intermission, they pressed upon the inhabitants, and evermore one succeeded another; whiles some reared ladders against the walls, others threw balls of f re against the gates, yet the defendants of the City held out and endured L that turious and violent tempest: because they hoped that neither the Maceconians lying abroad were able any long time to endure the rigor of the cold winter; nor the King on the other ide could have so much release and relaxation from the Roman war, as to stay there and make his abode, But after they perceived once the mantilets approach, and the frames of turrets and fabricks erected their perfishance was over-matched & they began to relent, For besides that in plain force they were the weaker and not able to refift, diffressed also they were for want of corn, neither had they flore of any other provision, as being taken on a fuddain, and looking for nothing less than fiege at luch a time of the year. Therefore when they were pall all hope to be able any longer to rehilt, C. La vilius Spoletinus and C. Afranius were fent from the Roman garrison, to crave of Perfew, first that he would permit them to depart in their arms, and to carry with them their bag and M baggage: secondly, if they might not obtain so much, that he would bet give them assurance of life and liberry. The King was more free and liberal to promife, than faft and taithful to perform. For atter he had commanded them to go forth and carry with them a lthat was their own: the first thing that he did was to disarme them and take away their weapons,

They were not to foon departed out of the Town but both the company of the Iliyrians, to the number of 500 men, and also the inhabitants of W and rendred themselves and their City, Parfens when he had put a garrison in Uscana led away the whole multitude of the yeelded Towns men (and those were well-neer as many in number as his own army) and transported them to Stulera: where after he had fent the Romans (all belides their Captains) who were 4000 fighting men, into fundry cities to be kept in ward, and fold the Ulcanians and Illyrians; he led his army N back into Pen flia, intending to be mafter of Oin um. a Town feated otherwise commodiously, and withalit is the very key and highway that openeth passage into the country of the Labeats, within the realm of King Gentius, and where he kept his roial state, As he passed by a strong borough-Town well inhabited, named Draud cum, one about him that was well acquainted with the coasts of that country put into his head, that bootless it was and to no purpose to win Oene um, untels he had Draudec also in his hands, as being a Town structe more commodiously in all respects. Whereupon he advanced forward, and so soon as ever he presented his army before it, incontinently all the inhabitants submitted and yeelded. Being much animated and encouraged with this furrender of theirs, which they made far fooner than he hoped or looked for; after that he per cived how terrible this redoubled army of his was, all the way as he marched he brought O under his subjection eleven other Castles and strong holds, upon the like fear that they were put into. Violence he used against very sew of them; the rest yeelder illingly: wherein were taken 1500 Roman fouldiers, placed there in several garrisons. In great stead and to very good use ferved Carvilins Spoletinus in all their parlies, who evermore gave it out that there had been no cruelty nor rigor exercised upon him and his fellows. At length the King came before Oeneum, which could not possibly be won without a set and full siege. For the Town had far more youth and able men within it then the relt, was fortified with a ftrong wall about it, and defended of the one fide with the river called Areass, and of the other with an exceeding high hill, and the same of hard and difficult accesse. All these things considered, the townsmen were in good hope to be able for to make reliftance. Perfeus, having entrenched the town and cast a rampier round about it, began likewise to raise a terrace & mount from the upper part thereof, to that beight as might formount and over-top the wals. But during the time that this peece of work was in hand and brought to perfection, a great number of the inhabitants within were confumed by diversand fundry adventures, whiles they skirmished oft and sallied forth, endeavouring both to defend their own wals, and also to empeach the fabricks and deviles of their enemies. And those that remain. ed alive, what with toillome labour night and day, and what with many a wound, were past all R fervice and good for nothing. So foon as the terrace and mount aforefaid was raifed close unto the wall, both the Kings cohort (whom they call Nicatores) mounted up into it, and also with ladders the affault was given unto the City in many places at once. All that were above fourteen years old he put to the fword: their wives and small children he cast into prison. The rest of the boots and pillage fell to the fouldiers share. As he returned from thence with victory to Stubera, he lent as Embassadors un to Gentius, Pleuratus the Illyrian (a banished person who sojourned with him) and Aputeus a Macedonian of Berrhaa. Them he gave in charge to declare unto Genius, what hehid atchieved against the Romans and Dardanians the summer past, together with the late exploits performed in that winter expedition; and withall to perswade the K. for to be knit in amity with him and the Macedoni ns. These Embiffadors having transmounted the top of the hill Scordus and traversed the wilds and wolds of Illyricum, which the Macedonians of purpose had laid well and defert, to the end, that the Dardanians might have no e-fie passage either into Illnicum or Macedony) after much pain and travell they arrived in the end at Scodra. No wis K. Gentins at Liffus, and thither were the Emo. fladors fent for, where they delinered their melface with gracious audience: but they went away with an antwer to no effect; namely, that he winted no will, and his heart was good enough to war upon the Romans; but his coffers were empty, and he lacked mony especially, to go in hand and enterprise that which he defired. This answerthey related unto King Perfeus at Stubera, at what time as he was most busic in felling of his captives taken in Illyricum. Then forthwith were the lame Embafladors addressed again unto him, accompanied with Glaucias one of the Kings guard and iquires of his body, without any n mention made of mony, and that was the only means to induce the bare and needy barbarous Prince to levy war. After this, Perfous ranfacked the City Anogra, and once again reduced his army into Penestines country, and having strengthned the garrisons in Vicana, and in all the forts and peeces about it, he returned into Macedony.

L, Cains: a Roman lieutenant, lay in guard for the defence and rule of Illyricum, who durft noe fiir to long as King Perfens was in those quarters; but in the end after his departure, he endeavoured to recover Vseam in the Peneltins country, but was repulsed from thence by the garrison of the Macedonians there, and caried away nothing but many adry knock and bloudy wound, & to retired with his forcesto Lychnidum: from whence, tome sew daies after the sent M. Trebulum Fregelams into the Peneltins country, with a throng power, for to receive hostages of those Civies who faithfully had persisted in amity & friendship-Hecommanded him also to go to ward to the Partins (for they like which had covenanted to put in pledges) for that of both these nations, the field hostages might be gotten without any stir and trouble. The hostages of the Peneltins were sent to Apollonia, but those of the Partins to Dyrrbachum, which in those daies was more usually alled by the Greeks Epidamnus.

App. Canding, desirous to rafe out the blemish and make amends for the dishonour received in Unicum, let in hand to assault Phanores a fort of Epirus, having brought thither with him the Athimans and Thesprotians (over and above the Roman army) to the number of 6000 men; but he got nothing there but travell for his paines, by reason that the place was valiantly defended by Clevas, left there with a strong garrison by K. Perfeus. Perfeus likewise made an expedition to Elymen, and after he had taken a folemn furvey of his army about it. he conducted his power to Strains at the request of the Epirots This Strains then, was the strongest City of Il Etolia, Situat. it is upon the gulf of Ambracia, neer the river Achelous he advanced thither with 10000 foot & not above 300 horse of them the took the fewer with him in number, by reason of the it: eight paiages and rugged wates. Being come at the third dates end fo far as to the mount Citins, after he had with much difficulty paised over it, the thow lay to deep, that hardly and with much ado could he find a convenient place to encamp in. From thence he remed, more for that he could not there abide and remain, then for any incolerable way and weather he mee withall in his difmuch and journey forward : io with paifing great travell and trouble, of his beafts especially, the stondday he arrived at the temple of Inpiter called Niceus, and there lodged. Then after he had taken an exceeding long journey, he abode at the river Arachthus, being staied there by reslonof the deep water: during which time, he made a bridg over and transported his forces and when he was gone a daies journey onward, he encountred on the way Archidanus a principal prion of the Etolians, by whole means the Cit yot Stratus was to be delivered up unto him And that day he lodged upon the frontiers of Atolia: from whence next morrow he journeyed as hrasto Stratus, where having encamped neer the river Achelous, he looked that the Ætolians would run one unto him by heaps at all their gates, to yeeld the intelves to his protection ; but in:

flead thereof he found their gates that & garifons of the Romans received into the City that very u night when he came, together with the lieutenant C. Popilius. For the chief of the City (who induced and enforced by the authority of Archidamus whiles he was prefent in place, had lent for the K.) became more flack and negligent, by occasion that Archidamas was gone forth to meet with him, and thereby gave advantage and opportunity to the adverte faction, to fend for Popilius with a 1000 footmen from Ambracia. In very fit time and to right good purpose came Dinarchus also a captain of the Æ:olian Cavalry, accompanied with 600 foot and a 100 hotle. Known it was for certain, that he marched toward Stratus, as intending to band and take part with Perfens; but changing his mind together with the turning of fortune, he joyned with the Romans. and banded against him for whom he fet out at the first. Neither was Popilius, among these waverings and inconftant spirits, more secured then he should be; and therefore incontinently gat T the keies of the gates into his hands, and possessed himself of the guard of the wals. And for Dinarchas and the Ætolians, together with the youth and able men of Stratus he besto wed them all in the forreffe, under a colour of guarding the same. Perfens, having affaied to parly with them from the hits which commanded the higher part of the City, finding them perverte and oblinat, and feeing them ready to fet him farther off with shot of their darts, encamped five miles off from the City, beyond the river Pin arns. There, he called a councell; in which, Archidamus together with the revolts and renegats of the Epirots, exhorted him there to fojourn and continue: but the captains of the Macedonians contrariwife were of advice that there was no ftriving with that troublesome and dangerous teason of the yeer, considering their provisions were not ready; and the affailants were like fooner to feel the feacity and want thereof, then the defendants in g reg and whereof, and especially for the enemies wintred not far from thence, he dislodged and removed to Aperantia. The Aperantians by reason of great credit of Archidamas among them, received him with a generall content. And the fame A chidamus was made captain thereovera garrilon of 800 fouldiers. And fo the King returned into Macedony, with leffe trouble both of his men and beafts, then he came thither. Howbeit the bruit blown abroad, that Perfeus led his forces against Strains, caused Appins to levy his siege from before Phanotes. And Clevas with brave regiment of luity men well appointed, followed hard after him, and at the foot of the hils which were almost unpaisail, he slew wel-neer a 1000 of them as they marched heavily armed, and took priloners above 200. But after that Appins was passed through streights& come into the plain called Eleon, he lay encomped there some few daies: mean while Clevas, accompanied with I Philoftratus the chief commander of the Epirots, passed over into the territory of Autigonea. The Macedonians went about to rob and spoil : but Philostratus with his cohort set him down in await, under a covert and hidden place for the purpole. And when as those of Antigonia issued forth in arms & charged upon the forragers as they ranged over the fields, and differied in ftragling-wile, purluing them too eagerly in their flight, they chanced to engage themselves over far within the valley where the enemies lay in ambush: and there to the number of a tooo of them loss their lives, and almost a 100 were taken prisoners. And so the enemies having sped well in all their enterprites, removed their camp close to that of Appins, to the end that the Roman army might do no violence and outrage upon their friends and allies. Thus Appine fpending the time in there parts to no purpole, and doing no good, after he had discharged the companies of the Changonian; ,& as many of the Epirots as were with him, returned in Illyricum with his Italian fouldiers. and when he had distributed them among the confederat Cities of the Partynians, there to winter, returned himfelt to Rome by occasion of a certain folemn facrifice. Perfens fent to Cassandrea for to lie in garriton there, a 1000 foot and 200 horle, whom he had cauled to come again out of the countrey of the Peneltins. And they that returned from Gentius related Stillithe same long from h:m, yet never refted he nor gave over to tempt and importune him, lending Embalsadors after Embassadors unto him, knowing right-well, that in him rested great importance: yet could not by any meanes possible bring the man to expend ought and to be at any charge, in a matter every way of great confequence.

Uintus Martius Philippus passing through wilds and woods, entered into Macedony and Surprised many Cities. The Rhodians sent Embassadors to Rome, threatning to aid Perseus, no leff. the people of Rome would conclude peace and contract amity with him: whereat was taken great Scorn and disdain. Now when the charge of this war was committed to L. Emylius Paulus the Con-Jul now the second time for the year following, Paulus before the publike assembly of the people praired uneo the gods, that all infelicity and curfed fortune coming towards the people of Rome, might be A averted from thence, and light upon his own house. And fo having taken a voiage into Maccedony, vanquifind Perleus and subdued all Macedony. A little before he should strike a battel, C. Sulpitius Gallus a Martial Colonel, fore-warned the army that they should not wonder & be troubled in mind a the eclipse of the moon which was to bappen the next night following. In like fort Gentius the King. of the llyrians having entered again into arms, was overcome infield by Anicius the Pretor: and ha vine submitted himself to him, was with his wife, children and kindred, sent to Rome. From Alexandiathers arrived the Embassadors of Cleopatra and Ptolomeus King and Queen of Agypt, complaining of Antiochus King of Syria, for that he warred upon them. Pericus having follicited Eumenes King of Pergamus, and Gentius King of the Illyrians to aid him, was abandoned, for that he made not true paiment of mony according to his promife.

-Nthe beginning of that spring which immediatly followed the winter wherein these occurrents hapned, Q. Martins Philippus the Conful came to Brundufium with five thousand menwhom he intended to transport over the leas for the supply of his legions. And M. Popiline (one who had been Conful) and other brave gallants of noble parentage as well as himself, followed after the Conful to be martial-Tribunes in the Macedonian legions, Alfo about the fame time C. Martins Figulus the Pretor, and Admirall of the navy, repaired to Brundusium. Who weighing anchor, loofed to fea from It aly together, and arrived the next day at Corphu; but the morrow after that, they put within Alliam, an baven of Acarnania. From thence the Confid let C fall for Ambracia, where he disbarked and travelled by land to Theffidy. But the Pretor beving doubled the point of Leucas, entered the gulf of Corinth; leaving his veisels at Criufa, journied likewifeby land to Chales unto then wal forces, making fuch expedition that he crossed through the midft of Bastia in one day. At the same time A. Hoftiling lay enc mped in Theffuly, neer to Palepharfalns. Who albeit he had performed no memorable exploit of warlike tears. yet he had reclaimed his fouldiers from all licentious loonfels, wherewith they were corrupted, and ranged them within good order of discipline. Also by his fambfull corraige in government, he had entertained and kept the love of the allies still, yea, and protected them from all mann r of wrong and injury. Now when he was advertised of the arrivall of his successor, he assembled with all diligence his forces both men and horfe, & gathered together all armor, as welloffenfive as defenfive and to with a brave army right well appointed, he went forth to meet the Conful upon the way. Astheir fi-ft encounter and meeting was honourable, and befitting as wel their own reputation as the greatestate of the Roman name, to for the managing of the affairs afterward[* it was very exnegleate to the Conful Philip. For the pro-conful turning to his own army, exhorted the fouldiers here deficitive, toperform valiant tervice; and to when he had delivered it to the Conful, returned to Rome.] but may be Some few daies after, the Conful made an oration in a foleum audience of all his fouldiers : Wher- supplied, as infielt he began with the particide of Perfeus, committed upon the person of his own brother, Signius thinkbut projected against his very father. Then he proceeded forward and declared the wicked and enhances was divelish means whereby he attained to the crown, also his practifes of poyloning, his bloudy murderers belaid swait for King Eumenes bis life by way of deteftable brigandage and robbery : more-"over, theinjuries offered to the people of Rome, and facking of affociat Cities against the cove-E a nants of accord. All which dealings of his he should find one day (quant ne) by the idue of his "affairs, how odious and curfed they are in the fight also of the immortall gods. For the gods are "evermore favourable and gracious to piety and fidelity, the only means whereby the people of " Rome is mounted to that pitch and height of felicity. Then he compared the forces of that State "which already compassed the round world, with the strength of Macedony; he let at mes to ar-"mics, making remonstrances how far greater was the puissance of Philip and Antiochus before. and yet was it defeated utterly by no greater power then the Romans now were able to shew. "Having thus enkindled and enflamed the courages of his fouldiers by this maner of exhortation." he began to "debate in counsel as rouching the principal and main point of the whole war. And thither repaired unto him from Chalcis, the Pretor C. Martius, after he had taken the charge of the armado and sea forces. Resolved it was and concluded to make no longer abode in Theffuly, and there to lofe time, but pretently to diflodg and remove directly into Macedon; that the Pretor alfo should endevour and calt, how at one and the felf same time he might infest and annoy the leacoalts of the enemies. Now after that the Pretor was difinified &tent away, the Conful commanded his fouldiers to bring every man with him provision for a month: and to the tenth day after he had received the conduct of the army, he removed the camp and tet forward. When he had gone adaies journey, he called together the guids, nd after he had commanded them every one to declare before the Conneel there affembled, which way each of them intended to direct the army he cauled them to go afide; and then debated it was in councel, which courfe to take above all others. Some were of opinion to lead by the way of Pythoum; others advised to passe over the Cambunian mountains, like as the yeer before Hoft liver the Conful conducted his army; and there were who gave advice to go neer to the moor of Afcaris. Now thereremained yet some part behind of the way, which lay sudifferent still and common to all these places; and therefore their consultation of this point was put over to the time when they should encamp near to the parting and division of the said wates. So from thence he led the army to Perrhabia, and lat him down between Azerus and Deliche, for to confult once again for all, which way to take. LIII 2

The four and fortieth Book of T. Livius.

The same time Perfens knowing that the enemy approached, but yet ignorant which way he H meant to come, determined to befet all passages with strong guards. Whereupon he letit ten thousand vong and lusty men lightly armed, to the pitch of the Cambauni in hils (which the johabitants themselves call Volustana junder the conduct of captain Asclepiedoins. But he commanded Hippias with a power of twelve thousand Macedonians to leiz the fireights of a certain fort fitust upon the marth Afours, and is called Lapathus. Himfelt in perion accompanied with the reft of the forces, lodged first neer to Dium : but afterwards feeming as if he were unprovided of counsel and void of sense and understanding, he with his light horimen made rodes and courses along the tirand, one while toward Heracles, and other whiles to Phila; and so backward again the same way to Diam. In this mean time the Consul resolved fully to lead his army by that pass where we faid before that the army of King Philip encamped fometimes neer a place called Offe. I lopkar. Howbeit he thought good to fend out before four thousand armed men, for to prevent the enemies and be poiseised first of the most commedious places of advantage : this regiment Was commanded by M. Clandins and Q. Martins, the Confuls ion; and incontinently all the for zes in generall followed after. But the way was to fleep and difficult, for ough, uneven and moged, that in two daies space, they which were sent before, albeit they were not charged with the carri ge of any thing, had much ado to march fifteen miles: where they lodged, and the place which they made choice of was called the Tower Endiern, From whence the morrow after they iontnied feven miles forward and feized a hill not far from the enemies camp: where they difparched a courrier backto the Contol to give intelligence, that they were come neer to the enemy. and felled in a place of fafety, commodious also for all purposes; and withall to advise him for to K make all possible speed after, for to overtake them and join together. This messenger encountred th Confulatthe Mear Afenris, where he was greatly perplexed as well for the difficulty of the way which he was to enter himfelf, as also in regard of the danger of them whom in to few number ne had lent before, even through the midft of the enemies corps de guard. Whereupon he took a bester hears to himself; and having united all his forces, encamped upon the foresid hill which his men already held, on that fide which (confidering the nature of the ground) was most commodions. And there they might discover within the view of eie, not only the enemies camp dittant from thence a little above a mile, but also the whole countrey as far as to Diam and bilds yea, and all the fea coalt by reason that the high pitch and top of the mountain yeelded a prospect far and neer round about. And this was it that let on fire the foul liers hearts, when they beheld L the whole weight of the war, the Kings forces altogether, and the enemies countrey to neer unto them. In which spirit of cheerfulness when they were earnest with the Conful, and exhorted him to advance directly against the enemies camp, they had but one day granted them to relt after their wearslome journey. So upon the third day the Conful leaving part of his forces to guard the camp, led the relt against the enemy. Now had Hippias been lately fent from the King to keep and gua d the passage, who since the time that first he espied the Roman camp upon the hill, had prepared the minds of his men to a battel, and fo encountred the army of the Conful and met it half way. The Romans advanced forth to fight, nimbly appointed; and the enemies likewife were ligh ly armed, and by reason thereof most fit and provided for to give the charge and begin skirm:(h). So foon as they affronted and encountred one another, prefently they fell to lancing M of their darts on both (ides, Many a wound was given and received of the one part as well as the other by their rash charging at random, and few of both sides were slain. Thus were their stomacks whetted and edged against the morrow; and then had they skirmishes, and maintained tight with greater forces, and more deadly feud, if the ground would have terved them to have displaied their battallions at large: but the top of the mountain was streight and aroseto2 tharp creft in form of a coin or wedg; and ibardly afforded room enough for three ranks of armed men affront; and therefore when lome few were in fight, all the reft and specially they that were heavily armed, stood as lookers on. As for the light armour of one part, they would run forth at the broken crags of the hill, and ever from the fides join battel with the like of the other part : yea, and find meanes to charge their enemie, were the place even or uneven, it skilled not N whether. But after that more that day Mo were wounded then killed, the night at length parted the first. The third day, the Roman Generall was to leek and wift not what to do; for neither could be flay any longer upon that hill, for want of all things; and retire back from thence it was t ot possible, without dishonour and danger both. Moreover, if he had retired, the enemy might prese upon him from the upper ground with advantage. There remained therefore no other meanes toamend that which was the audacioully enterprifed, with as refolu e & hardy perfiftance in execution; a thing that other whiles proveth well in the end, as it it proceeded from wile and deliberat counsel. And verily to this hard passe and disticult terms they were come, that if the Contul had been to deal with an enemy like to any of the Macedonian Kings in old time, he might foon have received a great foil and overthow. But K. Perfens as he coasted and ranged with his O cavalry upon the firand neer Diam (albeit for the space of 12 miles wel-neer, he heard the cries and thours of them that were in fight;) neither reenforced the companies by fending fresh fouldiets in place of the wearled, not she wing himself in person at the battel. (which had been a thing l'affure you of most importance) whereas the Roman General being above 60 yeers of age, corpulent befides, &unweldy, performed himtelf right luftily all military fervices of a valuant warrior; perfilting in that to the very end most bravely, which he had begun and enterprised to boldly and hiving left Popitine for to guard, the hill top, paffed dyer places that had no trade at all of dreed them, by fending out before, certain men of purpole, o feour and prepare to make a paffige. As for Assalus and Milagenes, he comminded them both with the auxiliary fouldiers of their own nation to guard chem that opened the way before. Then he putting before him in the march the horlmen with baggage, came behind with the legionary tootmen in the rereguard. No tongue is able to expresse what a toil and painful labour they found in going down the bill, the sumpter hories with their backs & carriages tumbled to down one with another : in to much as when they had learcely gone four cules forward, they, withed in their hearts nothing more, then to recum the way they, came, if it had been possible. The elephants troubled the march as much in maner, as the enemies could : for when they were come to a place where they could fee no way, down B they call their riders and governors, laying them along on the earth, and with the horrible braying that they made, affrigued their horles especially, untill such time as a device was found for their paffige. They began first to make the head or entrance of the bridg at the very b ow and edg of a freep downfal : this done, in the lower ground beneath, they tertalt in the earth good firing and long polts of wood, two by two differs one from the other traverle, while little more then the largenels of one of their bealts. Upon which refled fall, joined [with ten on & morteile] certain rafrers like wal plats 30 foot in length, and those being couched with planks croile over in form of a bridg, had earth and mould call the reupon. A little way off beneath it, such another bridg was made; and to a third likewile, and many more confequently according as the craggy ground was broken and uneven. Now the elephant from the firm ground entred upon the first bridg aforefaid; but before he was gone as far as to the foot and end thereof, the polts abovenamed were cut in two underneath; to the end that the bridg might fall, and in the calle recling therof the heaft allo gently flide, as it were, and he carried therewith as far as the head of the feconducing. Thus some of them glid and kept themselves standing upright on their fact others relledupon their buttocks. Again, when they were come to the plaid and levell floor of another fuch like bridg, by the fall of it in maner aforglaid they were driven unto a third bridg beneath it, untill fuch time as they were come to a more plain and even valley. In this order the Romans could rid little more then feven miles that day. And the least part thereof went they upright on their feet but were fain most-what to tumble and roll over and over with the armor and fardels about thems and thus they gat forward in all kind of pain and trouble, in such fort that he who induced them to this journey & conducted them therein, could not deny but the whole army (with a final power. coming against them) might utterly have been defeated. By night they arrived at a prety plain, but the place being enclosed on all fides, they had no space and room to view round about, who ther it were dangerous or no. At length after much ado and beyond their expectation, they met with a firm peece of ground, whereas they maight take fure footing; and there they were forced the morrow following to attend in the hollow, valley the coming of Popilius and the companies left with him; who also were exceedingly fore vexed and plagued with the roughnesse of the way, albeit the enemies troubled and affrighted them no whit at all. The third day, after they had joined their forces together, they took their way through a paffe, which the inhabitants call Callipence. The fourth day they passed over a place that had no more meanes to direct them, then the other before; but by use and experience there were grown more skilfull: and better hope they had, for that the enemy in no place appeared, but approached neer to the fea. When they were come once down into the plains between Haracetus and Lebethrus, the footmen (whereof the greater part kept the hils) pitched their tents and took up the valley, and a good part of the plain wherein the horimen should quarter. As the King was bathing himself, it is said that word came, How the enemies were neer at hand: at which news he was to feared, that he leapt out of his buthing veffel, and in half gat him out of the bame, crying aloud, That he was vanquished with out drawing (word and flroke given : neither wift he for fear which way to turn him, taking fundry countels one of another, and commanding he knew net what, fometime this and fometime. In this perplexity he fent for Afelepioderus (one lof his two especial friends) ont. of the place where he lay in garrison, to go to Pella where all his money and treature lay; and by this means opened all the avenues for the Romans to make war. Him felf, after he had had in. great halt bestowed and piled up in his ships, all the gilded images at Diam, to the end that the enemy should make no prize of them, caused with all speed possible to truste up and to remove to Pydna; & hereby gave occasion, that the enterprise of the Conful which might have seemed rathe nels (in that he had engaged himfelf to far, that he could not possibly to retire again without leave of the enemy) proved in the end no inconsiderar and unadviled designment. For now the Romans, had the choice of two passages through which they might eleape away, the one, by Tempe into. Theffaly, the other into Macedony, by the way neer Dium : both which before were held by the Kings guards. So as if a resolute and fearless captain could have held out and endured but one ten daies the first apparence and she w of terror that approached the Rom, could never have returned Ginto The flaty by Tempe, not found way for conveignce of provition & victuals to the place where they were. For Tempe is of it tell a difficult passage, even without any force of arms to make it dangerous. And why befides the straight gullet five mils in length, yeelding a very narrow way. for one beaft to go charged with burden; the rocks of either hands are lo licep and upright, that hardly a man is able to look down from them, but his eyes will dazle, his brain turn, and his head begiddy withall. Moreover, the found and noile, yes, and the depth of the river Penens canning directly through the midt of the valley, encreased the fear is much the more. This place is petil. H lous of its own nature, had been holden and guarded with the Kings garrifons in four leveral& diftant places. The one kept at the very first entrance, neer to Commit; the second at Condilor. a fort impregnab e ; the third ab out Lapathui, which also they call Charax; and the fourth was placed even apon the very avenue it telf about the midft of the valley, where it is at the streightest, and which may easily be defended with ten men, if there were no more. In this maner (I isy) the passage being stopped up by Tempe, as well for portage of provisions thither as for return from thence, the Romans must perforce have retired again up to the same mountains from whence they were descended. But as they come down and were not discovered, so being now descried, they could not possibly have gained them again in open view, confidering that the enemies had poffelled the tops of the mountains; and no doubt the difficulty thereof be fides, which they had r tried already, would have cut off all hope of that adventure : to as, being waded thus far into this rath emerprife there remaineth no meanes elfe for them, but to have palled through the midft of the enemies, at Dium, for to to cicape and palle into Macedony: an adventure no doubt, fifthe gods had not bereft the King of his right wits) most difficult and dangerous unto them. For it being io, that from the foot of the mountain Olympus unto the fea, there is little above a mile fpace between : the one half whereof, is taken up with the mouth of the river Bapbyrus, which in this place (preadeth very broad and large; and another part of the plain, either the temple of Jupiter or the town it felt occupieth : the rest besides, being but a very small place, might have been enclosed and made fast against them with a little trench and rampier besides such store there was of stone ready at hand, and of timber out of the forrest, that they might either have raised a K mure, or framed turrets and such like fabricks in their way. Bet the K. (whole spiritand underit anding was blinded with juddain fear) for elecing none of all these things, but disturnishing every fort of their garrisons, made open passage for the current of war, and fled himself to Pydna. The Conful perceiving that he had gotten great advantage and many hopes by the tolly and negligence of his enemy, dispatched a currier back toward Lariffa unto Sp. Lucresius, willing him to feiz those forts into his hands about Tempe, which were abandoned by the enemy, and after he had lent Popilius before in spiall to discover all the passages about Dium, and perceived that the avenues were open in all parts, he marched forwards himfelf, and the fecond journy came to Diam, where commanded to encamp under the very temple to the end, that no violent outrage should be committed in that holy place. Himfelf in proper person entred into the City, which as L it was not great, so it was garnished with fair publick buildings, beautified with a number of goodly images, and paising well fortified besides : in io much as he could not wellbeleeve, that things of such importance were abandoned for nothing, but that there was some secret deteit and treachery lucking underneath. After he had ftaied there one full day, to espie and see that all coalls were cleer, he dislodged and marched on; & supposing verily that he should be provided of sufficient store of grain, he advanced forward that very day to the river named Mytis. The morrow after took post sion of the City Agasa, which the inhabitants willingly rendred unto him. And to win the hearts of all other Maccdonians, (contenting himself only with hostages) he promifed to leave their City cleer without a garifon, and to permit them to live under their own laws without paiment of any tribute. Being marched onward one daies journey from thence, he pitch- M ed down his tents fast upon the river Afcordus: but feeling and finding still (the farther be went from Thefsaly, more and more want of all things, he retired back to Dium; and then all, men faw plainly &made no doubt, to what streights he should be driven, in case he had been clean shut out from Thefsaly, confidering that it was not late for himto remove far from thence wherehe was

Perf. as having rallied all his forces, and assembled his captains into one place, checked and ratted up the captains of the garritons and guards aforefaid over the passages but above all he rebacked Afelepiodorus & Hippins most, saying that those two had betraied unto the Romans the portgate to Macedony: wheras indeed no man was more justly to be blamed, for that than his ownself

The Contulater he had difeovered a far off from fea affect of Roman ships, conceived good hope that vessels were coming the reged with provision of victuals for now in his camp the death N was great, and brought they were already to extream want and fearcity. J But he was adertifed by them who were entred within the habor, that the hulks and ships of burden were lest behind at Mos miss. Whereupon, being in great doubt what to do so had went all things with him for the pretent, that he had work enough to wrestle with that only difficulty, without being started encumbred with any empeachment from the enemy) behold, in happy time, letters were brought unto him from Sp. Lucretius, importing thus much; That he was master of all the forts and holds planted upon Tempe and round about Phila, where he had sound great plenty of corn and other necessaries. The Consul right joious for these good tidings, set his army on foot from Dism to Phila, as well to strengthen the gartison there, as also to deal corn among his souldiers; which would have required a long time ere it could have been brought over to them at Disms.

That departure & journey of his was pothing wel spoken of a for somegave out that the General retired from the enemy for very scar, a because that if he had staicd there still, he should have been forced to a battel: others said, that he had no skill in war, neither in those occurrents, which for tunes we heele turning about altered every day, offering one new thing or other; who when occasions and opportunities were presented unto him, let the same slip out of his hands, which some after might not possibly be recovered again. And verily he had not so soon quit the possible of

As Dinne, but he started and wakened the enemy, and put in his head now at length to regain those matters, which had been lost before through his own default. For hearing that the Consul was departed, he returned ammediately to Dinne: where he repaired what loever had been demoid fined and ruinat by the Romans: the battlements of the wals which were cast down he set up again in the right place: and in all parts fortissed the mure and bulwarks of the City. Which done, he encamped five miles off on this side Empens, intending that the river it self which is very hard to be passed over, should serve in stead of a rampier and treach of defence. This river runneth out of the vale from under the mountain Olympus, and in summer leason is small and show, but in winter it sileth high and spreadeth broad by reason of rain: running also with a forcible current and stream, it surmounteth great rocks, and among those stony crags and shelves maketh many g whitpis: by occasion likewise, that from thence it carrieth away with it into the sea, story path whitpis: by occasion likewise, that from thence it carrieth away with it into the sea story of earth, there are many gulfs of exceeding depth: and by reason that it hath eaten a hollow channell in the mids, the banks of each side are very high and steep upright. Perfens, supposing that by the means of this river, the enemies were debarred from all passes, purposed in his mind to hold off, and drive out the rest of the summer in that fort.

The four and fortieth Book of T.Livius.

Bet the Conful in the mean while fent Popilius from Philainto Heracles with 2000 armed fighting men. This Heracles itandethabout five miles from Phila, lituat in the mid-way between Diam and Tempe, upon arock that commandeth this river, Popilius, before that he caused his men to approach the wals, fent certain persons of purpose to perswade the magistrats and chief of the City, to make proof of the faithful protection and elemency of the people of Rome, rather Othen to trie their rigor and violence. But this motive and advice availed not, because they might dilcern the fires out of the kings camp neer to Enifert, whereupon both from the land and icafide for the fleet also being arrived anchored neer the shore as wel by force of arms as by fabricks and engins of battery, they began to assail the town, Moreover, certain yong and lasty Roman fouldiers (making use now in war of exercise which they had practised in the games Gircenfes) gat over the wall where it was lowest. The maner was in those daies (before this wast produgality came up of filling the whole cirque or shew-place with beasts fet out of all countries) to devide and feek fundry forts of publick fights & spactacles to behold, & not running one course with the chariot, and another on horieback, and io an end, to employ at both races the space of one full hour. Among others feats of activity exhibited, the masters and wardens of those exercises and Deines brought into the race commonly 60 (and otherwhiles more) lufty yong men in arms well appointed. There training in part teprelented a flew and apparance of two armies encountring and encountring and charging one another, in part also the use and practite of a more gentle and elegant exercife then military profession, and coming necret to the handling and managing of weapons after the order of tword-fencers. Thele yong gallants, after they had performed other ordinary running couries, put themselves into a four-iquare squadron, with the bucklers or targets close couched and joined together over their heads, in this manner : they that were formoft in the front flood bolt upright; the fecond rank flooped fomewhat lower under the other; the third course more then they ; and so the fourth untill the hindmost kneeled on their knees : and by this means they relembled a pavoilade rifing up higher & higher, like the pent-house or roof of adifices. EThis done, two men well armed, fetching their run fifty foot or thereabout backward from thence, and feeming to defie and challenge one another, mounted the foresaid pavoisade, ran from the nether end up to the top upon thole eargets to jointly united and fet close and thick together, and one while they fet their countenance as though they would defend the fides and edges thereof, otherwhiles in the mids they feemed to performed their devoir and maintain combat one with another, as upon firm and fready ground. Like for all the world to this, was there a pavoilade framed and brought close to that part of the wall; and when armed men were mounted upon it. they that stood upon the very ridg thereof, were as high full as the defendants which kept the walls who being once beaten back and turned down, two enligns of fouldiers gat over into the City. The only difference between this pavoisade and the other above described was this, that they onply who flood in the front before and in the flanks, bare not their targets aloft above their own heads, because their fides and bodies should not be naked and exposed to hurt, but carried them before after the usuall manner of fighting men in a battell. By which means, neither the arrows and darts discharged from the wall hurt them affront, nor the shot that light upon their targetfence took any hold, but glanced and glid down-ward from the top without doing any harm. like to rain water that Mooteth from the ridg of an house, and runneth down the eves. The Conful likewife, now that Heracles was won, advanced forwards with his army thither, pretending as though he marched toward Dium, and as it after he had chafed and driven the King from thence, he minded to palled forward also into Pieria. But preparing now against winter, he commanded to make the waies fit and handlome, for the carriage of provision out of Theffa-G b, and to chale out commondious places for garners : also to build cerrain houses, wherein they that brought the provision, might lie in covert and lodg commodionily. Perfens in the end have lag taken heart again and gathered his wits together, upon that late fright which had amazed his fpirits, withed then withall his heart, that his commandements had not been obeied, at what time asin a fearfull fit he gave, expresse charge to cast the treasure into the sea at Pella, and to fet on fire, the atienall at Theffalon ica. Androniens being fent for to the same purpose to Theffalentia made no halt to execute his will, butt rifled out the time for the nonce, leaving the King fome respite to repent, as it sel out indeed. Nicias was not so provident and well advised at Pella, I in throwing away some part of the mony which he there found: howheir he thought his fault such, as night in some sort to be remedied and amended, for that, all the said treasure in manner was recovered by the means of certain dyvers that since of or it under water, and setch up from the bottom of the sea. But the King himself was so ashamed of this soolish tear, that in a melancholly he commanded those poor dyvers to be secretly murdered, yea, and afterwards Andronicus and Nicias also; the end that no person should remain alive that was privy to that south commandment of his. Amids thefe affairs, C. Martius having loosed to lea from Heraclea, and with his fleet tailed to Theffalonica, landed bis armed fouldiers in divers places of the shore, and made wast in the terri. tory all about : and when they made fallies out of the City and charged upon him, after some for. I tunat skirmifhes, he chaled them back and beat them within the wals. So as at length be terrified the town it felt : but not only they who ranged up and down here and there, unadvisedly approached the wals, were wounded with shot discharged out of instruments of all sorts, planted upon the wals ; but those also who were in the ships, were hurt with stones, weighed and levelled from engins a far off. Upon which occasion he commanded his fouldiers to retire a thipboord, and leaving the fiege of The falonica, they palled from thence to Ania, a City fifteen miles off, fituate in a fertile foil jult over-against Pidna. When they had spoiled the territory lying to that City, they coasted along the shore and arrived at Antigonia. Where, being set a land first they spoiled the countrey in every quarter, and brought good store of prizes to their ships but afterwards, as they stragled out of order and disbanded, the Macedonians, as well footmen as w horse, ran upon them, and chaied them as they fled apace to the sea fide ; in which rout they flew about 500 and took as many priloners, And nothing elle provoked the courage of the Romans (in regard as well of utter despair other wife to fave themselves, as of the indignity it self, soto hazard their honour) but only the extream necessity wherein they stood, having no means to recover their thips in tafety. Wherenpon they turned head, and renewed the fight upon the very tea strand. They also who were a shipboord, surccoured and helped them. In which conside two hundred Macedonians loft their lives, and as many were taken priloners. From Antigonea the fleet weighed anchor, & made head toward the territory of Pallone, where the fouldiers were feton there to spoil the countrey. The territory appertained to the confines of the Cassandreans, the most fruitfull tract of those parts which they had coasted and failed by. There King Enmene, be-1 ing departed from Elea with twenty war thips met with them, & likewise five other covert ships were tent from King Prufias. The Pretor feeing this good encrease and addition of his forces, took a better heart unto him, even to beliege " Caffandrea. This City was built by King Caffander, in the very streight & gullet which joineth the territory of Pallene with the rest of the Macedonian countrey, enclosed of the one fide with the Toronian fes, and on the other with the Macedonian. For there lyeth out a bank or shelf like a tongue into the ses, upon which the City standeth, and beareth unto the deep, no lesse in compasse and quantity then is the mountain Arko. It butteth full against Magnesia, with two promontories of unequall bigness; of which the greater is called Polideum; the leffe Canaftrium. This town they began to affail in two divers parts. The Roman (P retor) drew his fortifications to a place called Citia, opposing certain strong forked itakes for to debar and flux up the way from the Macedonian lea to the Toronian. On the other M. fide there is an Euripe or arm of the fea, from which quarter Eumenes gave the affault. The most trouble and toil that the Romans found, was in damming and filling up the trench, which Perfest had cast against them a little before. And as the Pretor enquired where the earth was bestowed which was thrown out of the trench storefaid, because he could see no heaps thereof any where, there were shewed unto him certain vaults and arches within, which bewraied a new wall, not built to the thicknesse of the old, but with perpend work, laid with one course of brick and no more. Whereupon he relolved to pierce through the faid wall, and to to make way into the City. The which he thought to execute and perform without being discovered, in case he scaled the well in another quarter, and by making a shout and alarm there, witherew all the defendants of no the City to the guard of that one place. There lay in garrison at Cassandrea (being a sufficient number of ferviceable yong men of the City) eight hundred Agrians, and two thousand Peneltins of Sclavony, fent from thence by Pleuratus: and both these nations are hardy warriors. Whiles there detended the wals manfully, and the Romans endevoured withall their might to mount over, the thin wals of the vaults and arches aforefaid were wrought and digged through in the turning of an hand, and gave entrance into the City. Now if they who brake in, had been armed (as they were but pioners) the town had been taken at that inflant. But when as the fouldiers heard news that the faid work was finished, they suddainly set up a cheerfull shout for joy, being ready some in one place and some in another to rush into the City. The enemies at the first wondred what the meaning should be of that suddain cry : but the captains of the garrison, Pytho and Philippus Pro- 0 co being once advertiled that the town lay open, supposing that herein consisteth the vantage, who could first prevent the other and give the charge, fallied forth with a strong band of Agrians and lilyrians : and whiles the Romans rallied themselves some from this place, and others from that, and were called together for to enter the City with banner displaied, they set upon them unready as they were, and not ranged in any good order, put them to flight and chaled them as far as to the trench, where they overthrew them one upon another by heaps: 600 or very were there killed

A and in maner whom they could reach between the wal & the trench were fore hurt. The Pre, thus overtaken in his own enterprife, was not fo halty to project any new deligns; neither thed Emmearrany better, albeit at one time he affaulted the City both by land nd fea. Wherupon they accord ded both, fo fet ftrong guards, for to impeach the passage of all garrisons out of Macedony thithets and (fince open force took no better effect) to affail the wals with fabricks & engins, As they were bulic in preparation thereof, there arived ten frigots of the Kings, tent from Maredon with certain select auxiliary Gauls. These when they perceived their enemies ships riding at anchor stailed in fingle range one after another, as close as possibly they could to the shore in the dark night, and fo entred the City. The bruit that went of this new fuccour and garrison, forced as well the Romins as the King to give over the fiege; lo fetching a compasse about the promontory, they B arrived before Torone. And when they began to lie against it, after they perceived once the there was a valiant company there to defend it, they abandoned their enterprire without effect. & failed to Demetrias. Being approached thither, and feeing the wals full of armed men, they pafted by and anchored at Iolous: intending after they had spoiled the territory, to set upon Demita trist. Mean-while, they Conful also, because he would not sit still doing nothing in the enemie's country, fent M. Popilius with five thousand fouldiers to give the affault to the City Melbed. Seated it is at the foot of the mountain Offa, on that fide which looketh to Theffaly, and very field for the purpole commandeth Demetrias. The first arrivall of the enemies put the inhabitants of the place in great aff ight ; but after they had recovered their fpirits danted with fo unexpected fear, they ran in arms to the gates, and up to the wals, where they doub ed and inspected and place like to give entrance, and incontinently cut off all hope from the enemies, that it could polfibly be forced at the first alsault. Whereupon they prepared to lay fiege unto it, & began to make fabricks and engins to batter the wals. Perfeur having intelligence, that in one inlant both Melibes was beleaguered by the Conful, and allo that the fleet anchored before lolcos, to the intent that from thence he might go in hand to assail Demetrias : fent Euphranor one of his captairs, with a chosen regiment of two thousand souldiers to Melibea; with this charge and directions That if he could raise the siege from Melibes and force the Romans to depart, he should mirch fectelly to Demetrins, & put himfelf within the town, before the Romans could remove from Iolo cu and advance before the City. The affailants of Melibea discovering him with his torces all at once upon the higher places, quit their fabricks and engins in fearful halt, and let them all on fire : n and thus they departed from vefore Melibea. Emphranor having levied the fiege from the one City forthwith led his army to Demetries. And then the citizens afford themfelves, that they should beable not only to defend the City against the siege, but also to save their territories from walk and fooil: and to they made fallies upon the forragers dispersed loofly here and there, not without drawing bloud of their enemies. Ho wheir the Presor and the King rode about the wals, and viewed the figuation of the to wn, if peradventure they could elpie any one place which they were like to force, citter with battery of engins or fore: of arms. The voice went, that by the means of Cydas the Cretenfian, and Antiochus governor of Demetrias there was a treaty of peace and amity between Philip and Eumenes. But ho wlosver it was, this is certain, both Eumenes and the Pretor departed from Demetriae. As for Eumenes, he failed to the Conful, and teltified unto him the joy that he conceived for his lafe and prosperous entrance into Macedony; and from thence returned to Pergamus into his own realm. But Martins Figulus the Pretor, when he flad fent part of his fleet into the harbor of Sciathas there to winter, with the rest of his ships went to Oremes in Bassia : supposing it a commodious City, from whence victuals and all provisions might belent to the armies that abode either in Macedony of Theffaly. As touching Eumenes, fundre authors have written diverfly. It a man should go by Falerius Antias and beleeve him, he reporteth, that neither the Pretor had any help from him by his navy, not with It anding that offent inies he had tent for him by his letters; nor took his leave of the Confut in good terms with favour at what time as he was to depart into Afia, as being highly displeated, that he was not permitted to quarter with him in one & the same camp; infomuch as he could not possibly be entreated by bima to leave behind that Cavalry of Gauls which he had brought thither with him. As for Artalus his brother, heremained still with the Conful (as Valerius laith) and continued syncere and faithful unto him without any change and alteration; yea and performed right good fervice in all that war. During thele wars in Macedony, there came Embafiadors from beyond the Alps to Rome fents from a pety K, of the Gauls (Balanes he had to name, but of what linage he was delcended it is not recorded) promising aid to the Macedonian war. Thanked they were from the Senat, and presents were tent unto them : to wit, a chain of gold weighing two pound; certain golden cups of four pound weight, a brave courier barbed and trapped, and an horismans armor. After their Guls were gone out of place, the Embalsadors of Pamphylia brought with them into the Senat igolden crown, valewed at 20000 Philip-peeces of gold: their request was, that they might Obe permitted to fet up the faid present and oblation in the chappell of fup. Opt. Max. and likewile to facrifice within the Capitol. Their petition was ganted and when these Embassadors were defious to renew the amity between them and the Romans, they received a gracious and iwer, and had of them's reward fent of two thouland Alses. Then the Embatsadors of King Prin-

fin, and anon after, others from the Rhodians had audience; who of one and the same argument discoursed diversity; for both tended to one thing, namely, a treaty for reconcilement of peace between the Rom. & K. Perfens. Prufice feemed to intrest rath ir then to demand protesting that he " had ever to that day flood with the Romans in that war; and willingly would friend themfill H to the very end thereof: but fince that there came Embaffadors unto him from Perfens, and " dealt with him to make an end of the war between him and the Romans, and for that he pro-" mifed them to be a mediator and interceffor for him to the Romans; therefore his request "unto them was (if they could fo find in theirs hearts) to flint their anger, & fo they should use "him in any service, as one that would acknowledg himself beholden unto them for a favor, in " effecting this atonement and reconciliation. In this maner (I fay) spake the K. his Embassadors. "But the Rhodians contrariwife, in a proud humour of theirs, reckoned up a beadroll of their "demerits towards the people of Rome, attributing the greater part (believe me) of the victory of "K. Antiochus to themselves : more over they added and said, that when the Macedonians and "Romans were at peace, they began to enter into league and amity with K. Perfeus; which they I " had interrupted and discontinued against their will; not upon any defert or occasion given of is his part, but only because it pleased the Romans to draw them into the affociation of the war. "Three daies now already (fay they) have we felt the finant of this war and lived by the loffe : by " reason that the seas are shut up from us, and our Iland is decaied and distressed for need and " want, having loft our tollage and customs issuing from the seas, which we are not able to en-"" dure any longer, have addressed Embassadors to Perseus into Macedony, to intimate unto him. "that the Rhodians will and pleasure was, that he should grow to a comp ofition and be at " peace with the Romans. Our felves also are fent to Rome to declare the same : and likewife to "denounce, that who loever shall impeach and hinder this course tending to pacification, the "Rhodians wil consider of them accordingly & bethink how they are to proceed against them, w I am verily perswaded, that there is no man at this day, who can hear or read this, but his stomack will rife thereat with indignation; gueffe then thereby how the LL, of the Senat of Rome were affected and touched as then, at the hearing thereof. Claudius mine author faith that there was no answer at all given unto them. Only an arest or decree of the Senat was read before them, importing thus much, that by order from the people of Rome, the Carians & Lycians were made free : and prefently were letters dispatched to both nations to fignifie fo much unto them, Which when the principal perions of the embaffage once heard, even he, whose big and brave words a little before, the whole Senat-house was hardly able to contain, sell down flat before them in a twoon and extane. Other Hiltorians write, that this answer was returned, "That the people of "Rome at the very beginning of this war, knew affuredly (by intelligence given from persons of " right good credit) how the Rhodians had secretly complotted with Perfeus against the state of "Rome: and if there had been some doubt thereof before, yet the words of the Embassadors ere-. waite delivered, made all cleer and put it past peradventure: and no marvell, fincethat for the . most part it falleth out, that such caute ous practiles how loever at the first they are covertly & " cleanly caried, yet one time or other are bewrsied and discovered. Let the Rhodians fend their "melsengers over the world and spare not; let them make themselves judges to determine of " war and peace at their pleasure as for the Romans they will take arms in hand, and lay them "down again at the will and appointment of the gods in heaven. We are well holpen up now in "deed, it we must have the gods no more to be witnesses of our accords, but the Rhodians for c' footh. And must the Romans (I would not else) be ruled by them, and withdraw their forces "Out of M. cedony? They will confider and advite themselves how to proceed against us! How M .6' shall we do then? What the Rhodians will see to, well may they perhaps themselves know: but the people of Rome (that is certain) well confider indeed and resolve after that Person is " vanquished (which they hope will not be long first) to recompense and requite every City and " flate according as they have described in the service of this war. As sharp as this answer was, yet they fent a reward to the Embass, to every one of them 2000 assessbut none would they receive,

A ter this, were the letters read or Q. Martini the Con'ul, conteining thus much namely, How he had passed over the streights of the forrest, and was come into Macedony, where he had provision of victuals which the Pretor had given order for out of other places to ferve for winter and besides had taken up of the Epirots twenty thousand Modii of wheat and ten thousand of barley, for which corn they fhould make mony ready at Rome to content their Embalsadors, N. Also that they must send from Rome souldiers liveries and other apparel; and need he had besides of 200 horse or thereabout; especially of Ninnidia; for in those parts he had no plenty of any thing. Hereupon an act was granted out of the Senat, That all these things should be done according to the tenor of the Conful his letters. So C. Sulpitim the Pretor bargained for the transporting over into Macidany of 600 fide calsocks and 3000 short coats or jackets, together with horses; for to be disposed and distributed at the discretion of the Conful : and besides paid the Embassadors of the Epirore good mony for their grain. He brought also into the Senat One simu the sonot Pytho a noble personage of Macedony. This man was evermore of countel with the K perswading him to peace: and admonished him as his father Philip before him observed an order even to the time of death to read over twice a day from point to point the inftrument of the accord & cove. 0 nants between him and the Romans; to he also would take up that good suftome and practife the same it not so continually yet at least wise many a time and often. But when he could by no meanes tearehim nor avert his mind from war. he began at first to withdraw and abtenthimfelf, alledging for his excuse one while this occasion, and otherwhiles that because he would not be present at the debating of those matters which he approved not and in the end perceiving

A that he was had in fome jealonfie, & other whiles charged to be a traitor, he changed his allegeanee revolted to the Rom, and lerved the Conful in right good fread This One finus being brought into the Senat house, related all these premisses : whereupon the Senat ordained, that he should be enrolled formally in the number of allies : alio, that he should be provided of a lodging, and his ordinary expences for the time allowed at the Cities charge Moreover, 200 acres of land in the teritory of Tarentum, which was conflicat to the people of Rome, should belet out for him; and a melluage in Tarentum bought for his habitation. To fee all this performed, C. Decimus the Pieter

The Cenfors upon the * thirteenth of December, took a furvey of the number of citizens and * thibus December, an eltimat of their goods, more streightly then aforetime. Many were unknighted and had their bru. R hories taken from them; and P. Rutilins among the reft, who when he was Tribune of the Comhad been their accuser and called them to violently to reckoning; degraded he was besides and displaced out of his own tribe, & made no better then a very labourer in the Cities works. Wheras the one moity of the Cities renews and profits for that yeer, was let by and allowed unto them by the treasurers (according to an ordinance of the Senat) Tib. Sempronius out of the mony assigned unto him, purchafed the houle of P. Africanus on the back fide of the old Carra neer the *Pore Vitties. image of Fortunas: the thops also wherein they fold wooll and the other adjoining thereto, all to the ule of the City. He caused like wife the stately palace to be built, which afterwards was called Semprenia Bafilica. Now was the yeer come about and well neer at an end, when by reason of the great care principally about the Macedonian war, men began to talk, whom they were to create for Confuls as guilt the next yeer, to atchieve and end the faid war ? Whereupon there paffed a decree of the Sea nat.thatCn, Servilius with all speed possible, should make hast to Rome for to hold a general affem. bly of election. This decree Sulpitims the Pretor within few daies after read to the Cof, to the end that he should repair home into the City before the day prefixed. Wherupon both the Cos, hairre i; & the laid election was also furnished by the day appointed. Call, these were created, L. Emplus Paulus the second time (even 14 yeers after his former Consulting) with C. Licinius Craffus. The day following were the Pretors also chosen, to wit, Cn. Babins Tamphilus, L. Anicius Gali lus. Cn. Offavius, P. Fonteins Balbus, Mar. Ebutius Helva, and C. Papyrius Carbo. The careful regard of the Macedonian war caused every thing to be done with gre ter expedition. And theren fore it wasthought meet, that these new elect magistrats should cast lots out of hand for their provinces, that it might be known to whether Col. Macedony, and to which Pretor the conduct of the navy should fall , that thereupon they might presently consider and provide for all things requisit to the war, & require thead vice of the Senat asneed required. O dained it was when the Confuls were entred into their office, to folemnize the Latine feltivall holidaies as foon as they might conveniently, without offence of the gods and breach of any religious orders that the Conial whole ick fell togo into Macedony, were not deteined behind upon any occasion. After their ordinances, Italy and Macedony, were nominated for the provinces of the two Confuls; and for the Pretors, the two civill jurisdictions within the City of Rome, the navy, Spain, Sicily, and Sardinid, In fine. Macedon fell to Empleus the Conful, and Italy to Licin us. Of Pretors, Cn. Bubius was lord chief just ice of the pleas of citizens, and L. Anicias of aliens. And if the Senat thought good to fend

pointed by lot L. Deputy of Spain, M. Ebutins of Sicily, and C. Papyrins of Sardinia. All men foon faw, that L. Amylins intended not to go coldly about the managing of that war s both for that he was not an ordinary man, but fingular above all other, and allo because that night and day he muled and studied upon nothing else, but that which was requisit and pertinent thereunto. The first thing of all wherewith he went in hand was this; a request to the Senat for to dispatch certaindelegat commissioners into Macedony, to visit the armies there and the armado: to make true report upon their certain knowledg, what was needfull to be done for the lapply of the forces as well by land as tea; allo to lie in espiall, & estimat as much as possibly they could the Kingspower: moreover, what quarter of the province were taken by our men, and which the the enemies kept; whether the Romans lay encamped ttill within the forcest, or if they were patfed beyond the ftreights and come into the even ground; who continued trulty allies, who were suspected, who hung in doubtfull terms, as whose fauth depended upon fortune : who teemed to be professed enemics: how great the provisions were of victuals; from whence they were conveighed by land; from what places transported by water; & I ftly, what exploits had been done the fummer pall both by land and lea : supposing, that for a light given and certain intelligence delivered of thelethings, he might be fure y directed in the calting and laying of future plots & defignments. So the Senat granted out a commission to Cn. Servilins the Col. for to fend the delegats into Mas cedour, luch as L. Emplies thought good of. Whereupon within two daies after, Cn. Domitius Encharbus and A. Licinius Nerva, took their journey as legats and commitsioners. News. came in the latter end of this yeer, that it rained liones twice, namely in the territory of Rome, and like wife about Veis : and therefore a novendiall facrifice was celebrated. This yeer there dies ed certain priefts, namely, Pub. Quintilius Varus, a flamin of Mars, and M. Claud us Marcellus a Decemvir, in whole room was inblitted Cneus Ottavius. And now noted it was, that the magnificance and port of the people of Rome encreated, for that in the plaies called Corcenfes exbibited by Publins Cornelius Scipio Nafica, and Publius Longulus Ediles Curule, three core and

3 wild beafts out of Africk, with 40 bears, & elephants, were baited to make sport to the people. When L. Emplius Paulus and P. Licinius entred their Consulship upon the fifteenth of March, which was the beginning of the yeer following, the LL, of the Senat were in great expectancy, and especially what the Conful would propose unto them as touching the Macedonian war, which was his proper province. But Paulus taid that he had nothing to propound and put to councel, feeing that the Delegats aforefaid were not returned. And at Brundufium (quoth he) they now are, having twice in their voiage upon the fea been driven back by tempelt and cult upon Dyrrhachium. But io foon as I am once advertised and have perfect knowledg of those things that first are to be known, I will then consult; and that will be within very few daies Now to the end that nothing may stay and hinder his journey he told them, that the even before the Ides of April, was appointed for the idemnity of the latine feaflival holydaies. And after facility fice duly performed [upon the Albane hill] the Sense should no somer ordein, but he and Co. Off avins would fet torth and put themtelves on their way. As for C. Liemins his colleague, his charge should be in his absence to provide and fend all things requisit and needfull for this war. Mean while (quoth he) the embassies of forrain nations may have audience given. So when he had facrificed as the maner was, before they took in hand the great affairs of State, the Embaffadors of Alexandria, from King Prolomena and queen Cleopatra, were called in. Clad they were in poor array, the hair of their head long, their beards fide and overgrown: and carrying in their hands branches of the Olive-tree, they entred into the Sen t, and fell groveling and prolutat upon the floor. Their habit and appared was not fo simple and mournful; their look and countenance not io heavy and forrowfull, but their speech was more piteous and lamentable. Ansochus now y King of Spria, and who had sometime been hostage at Rome under a colourable pretence of honefly and equity to reftore Ptolomans the elder to his Kingdom, made hot war upon his yonger brother, who then held Alexandria : and after a victory obtained in fea fight neer Pelusium he made a bridg of halty work upon the river Nilus, over which he transported his army, & now laid fiege to Alexandria: fo as by all likely hood he would shortly by way of conquest be lord of a most rich and wealthy Kingdome. In which regard, these Embassadors made pitifull most and grieveus complaint," befeeching withall the Senat, of their aid and fuccour to that realm and those Kings, who were such friends to their seignory and dominion. For perswaded they were that "the people of Rome had done to much for Antiochin in particular, & were of that account & auet thority with all other Kings and nations, that if they would but fend their Embsfladors to inti-" mate thes much, that the Senat was not well pleated with waging war upon confederat Kings, "he would prejently raile his flege, depart from before the wals of Alexandria, and withdraw his "army clean away into Syria. But it they protracted the time long and delaied thus to do, then " should Prolome is and Cleopatra within a while be driven out of their realm, and forced to come " to Rome. With some shamefull spot of dishonour to the people of Rome, in that they had not flet "their nelping hand in that extreamdanger of all their fortunes. The LL of the Senat moved with compaision at the praiers of their Alexandrians, fent incontinently C. Popilius Lenas, C. Decimius, and A. Hoffilius as Embafiadors to determine and make an end of the war between those two Prieces. In commission they had first to go unto Ptolomaus, and then to Antiochus, and to let them both understand, that unlesse they surceased and gave over arms, they would take him nei-M ther for friend nor confederate, whom it was long of that the war was not given over. So thele three together with the Alexar drian Embassadors, took their leave within three daies & departed. Then the forfaid Delegats returned from out of Macedony, the last day of the feastival games to Minerva called Quinquatrus, and not before they were welcome; for followed for they were, had it not been eventide when they came, the Confuls would immediatly have called the Senat together. But the morrow after the Senat fat, and those commissioners had audience given, Report they made first, that with more danger then profit entning, the army entred into Macedomy over those passes and streights, wherewas no way nor passe ge at all Item, that the King kept the countrey of Pierra, into which the Roman armie was now advanced, and were to neer encamped one to the other, that nothing but the river Enipeus between kept them afunder; that neither the K. made offer of battel nor the Rom, were of infficient ftrength to challenge & force himto fights moreover; hat the winter had overtaken them (a time unfeafonable for warlike exploits) that the fouldiers were nuzled and neurished in idlenels, notwirhstanding they had victuals to serve no longer then fix daies; also, that by report the Macedonians were thirty thousand strong. Were it to that Ap. Claudius had a good and fufficient power about Lychnidum, he might be able to trouble the K, and put him to his trumps in a battel; but now both Appins and the garrifon with him, are themselves in extream jeopardy, unless with speed either a complete army be sentthither, or elie they draw from thence where they are, into Macedony. Over and belides they related, how from the camp they went towards the fleet, where they heard fay, that some of the sea faring men and mariners were dead of fickness, others, and namely, those of Sicily above the rest were of gone home again to neir own houses, infomuch as there were not men enow to serve the ships of thole that remained, bed neither their wages paid & mony to put in their purie, nor liveries & apparel to hang on their backs. As for Eumenes & his fleet, they (like thips driven to a coast by force of wind and weatter, without any other errand or cause else) were come and gone again, and it feemed the mind of that K. was not we fetled and refolved. But as they reported al of Eumener fulpiciously & in doubtful terms, to they assured them of the fingular fidelity & constancy of Anilan

A his brother. When these Legats had spoke then said L. Emplius, Let us debate now in councill what is to be done as concerning the laid war. So the Senat ordained, that for eight legions the Consuls and the people should elect an equall number of martiall Tribunes or Colonels, the one as many as the other; and that none should be created and advanced to that place for that year, but such as had born some honourable dignity : then, out of all those Tribunes thus elected, that L. Emplius should make choise for those two legions which were to go into Macedons, of whom he would himself: also, that after the solemnity of the Latine seasts performed, L. Amylius the Conful and C. Offavius the Prætor and Admirall of the fleet, should depart into their Province; A third was joyned in commission with them, to wit, L. Anicius the Prætor and L. chief Justice for strangers, And ordained it was, that he should pass into Illyricum about Luchnidum, for to succeed B Ap Cland us. The charge of taking musters was put upon C. Licinius the Consul. He had commandment to enroll leven thouland [foot] Citizens of Rome, and two hundred horlemen and to charge the Latine allies with a levy of feven thousand sootmen, and four hundred horse. Also to fend letters unto Cn. Servilius, who governed the Province of Gaul, to enroll fix hundred men of arms. This army he had commandment to fend with all convenient speed to his Collegue into Macedony, so as in that Province there should not be above two legions, and the same full and compleat, containing fix thouland foot, and three hundred horse aprece. As for the surcrease, as well of the Cavalry as Infantry, they should be disposed and bestowed in fundry garrisons. And all such as were unmeet for service, were to be cassed and sent away. Moreover, the allies were pue to fee out and find 10000 foot, and 800 horse. And those were to serve in garrison under Anici-C st, over and above the two legions which he was commanded to lead into Macedony) confifting of 5200 foot, and 300 horsemen either of them. Also for the navy were enrolled 5000 mariners and rowers. Licinius the Col. was appointed to defend and kep in obedience his Province with two legions, and to take belides of allies ten thousand soot, and six hundred horse.

After these ordinances of the Senat were accomplished, L. Amylius the Cos, went forth of the Senat house into the common place before the assembly of the people; where he made a speech unto them in this wife following: "Me thinks I perceive and ice, my good friends and Citizens The Oration "of Rome, that ye have snewed more apparent tokens of joy and gratulation in my behalf, for that of L. Anyline "the Province of Macedony is faln to my lot; than either at the time that I was declared and fa- to the people ut luted Cof, or that day whereupon I first entred into government: & for no other reason in the of Kunte. In these matters, I say, I am but carried partly with conceit and partly with hope, But "this one thing I am affured of; yea and I dare affirm and promife on my own head, that I will "endeavour my felf and employ all that is in me, that this your good opinion of me may not be "in vain conceived. As for all things necessary and requisite to this war, both the Senat bath or-"dained & also, for that they have thought good I should depart immediatly (for which my self "am well pleased and contented, neither in me there shall be any delay) my Collegue C. Licinius, E " a fingular man, and of great valour, will provide with as great care and diligence, as if himfelf " had the full conduct of this war. For the effecting whereof, see that what soever I shall write eigh "ther to the Senat, or to you, ye believe for true: as for running rumours which have no certain "author, give no ear and belief thereto; neither feed them with your foolish credulity. For now "adaies verily, (a thing that I have observed to fall out ordinarily in this war) there is no man set-"teth so little by the common bruits that are blazed abroad, but his spirit and courage may be "thereby quailed and danted. Neither are they content to set down and pronounce, "what is to be done for the better: but if ought hap to be managed otherwise than they have si judged expedient, they are so bold as to controll the Cos, sea, and ready, to commen e process a ... gainst him indicially. These are shrowd hindrances, I may tell you, to warriors & men of action, "For all men have not the gift of resolution and constantly to neglect the speech and talk of men, "as sometimes Fabius had, who chose rather to have his authority & command diminished and impaired by the folly and vanity of lewd people, than with their favourable applause and good "opinion to manage his affairs but untowardly. And this oration ended, and the Latine festivals solemnized the day before the ca-"lends of March, together with the facrifices duly celebrated upon the Alban mount: the Cof. and the Prator Cn. Off wins departed incontinently into M. cedony, It is recorded in the Chronicles that the Cof, was honoured with a greater frequency that accompanied him thanufully had been known: and that men presaged in manner affuredly, the end of the Macedonian war show the Cos should have a speedy return, and obtain a brave and glorious triumph.

During thele occurrents in Italy, Perfeus who (because he was to be at the charges of disburing money) never thought of it, to go through with that which before he had begun, namely, to adjoyn unto him Genius King of the Illyrians: so soon as he perceived that the Romans were entred the straights, and the war come now to this extremity of hazard; thought good now to make w that fure and put it off no longer. Whereas therefore he had covenanted & promifed by his Embaffador Hipp as three hundred ralents of filver, with condition also, that for security hostages Thould be put in of both parties interchangeably he fent Pantanens one of his most truly friends to dispatch and make an end of this affair. This Pantaucus met the Illyrian King at Median in the Country of Labeatis: where he both took an oath of the King, and also received his hostages. Gentius likewise sent his embassador, named Olympio, to demand the semblable oath of Perseus, and require hoftages accordingly: with him were certain persons sent of purpose coreceive the money, who also by the advice of the said Pantaucus were to go in embassie with the Macedonians to Rhodes: and the men hereto appointed were Parmenio and Morcus. But they had in charge and commission after the oath taken, after hostages & money received, to go to Rhodes, & not before, L Good hope they conceived that the Rhodians might be sollicited and induced to take arms against the Romans, by using the name of these two KK, at once : and this account they made that if this State which carried the renown and honour above all others for sea-service, would once combine and band with them, they should leave the Romans no hope at all, either on land or sea. When thele Illyrians arrived, Perfeus departed with all his Cavalry from before theriver Enipeus where he was encamped, and encountred them near Diam. There were all the complements performed according to the covenants, in the fight and midft of the Cavalry, whom the K, of purpose would needs have to be present at this accord of affociation made between him and K. Gentius, supposing that it would comfort & encourage them the more. So the hostages were given and taken in the presence of them all. They also who were to receive the money were sent to Pella M where the K. histreasure lay: and those that should go to Rhodes with the Illyrian embassadors had comandment to embark at The falonica, Now was Metrodorus there, lately come from Rhodes who affured them by the means of Dyon & Polyaratus, two principall personages of that City, that the Rhodians were prest and ready to war. Wherenpon the said Metrodorus was appointed the chief in this embassage of Macedonians and Illyrians together. At the same sime likewise was addressed and imparted both unto Eumenes & also unto Antiochus such advice and counsel incommon, as the present condition wherin their affairs stood, might minister & afford argument namely, "That a free City and a K, were two; by nature, enemies that possibly could not fort together: "That the people of Rome went in hand with them severally one after another: & (that which was " a greater indignity 18c unsupportable) used the force of KK to overthrow thestate of KK For 10, N " by the sid of Astalusthey had brought his father Philip to ruin by the help likewise of Eumenes, " & partly also of his father Philip, Antiochus was defeated; & even now against himselfboth Es-"menes and Prussas were put in arms, If the kingdom of Macedony were once subverted have at " Afin next; which the Romans have in ome partieized already for their own under a colour of entranchizing Cities, & fetting them free: & then they will not leave untill they have Syria " too. For now is Prusius preferred in honour before Eumenes; & Antiochus for all his conquelt is "chased &debarred out of Agypt, which ought to have been the recompence of the war by him enterprised & chieved. In these regards Perfens advertised and them to consider & provide hold them for the comtherefore either to force the Romans to make peace with him iffion that the em- O mon enemies of all KK, in case they persisted still in so unjust a baffadors had to Antiochus was apert & open: but unto Eumenes andafface pretence of ranforming certain captives; but pradifed there were under hand more tester complots which caused Eumenes even then to be inspected & odious unto the Romans, yea, & charged afterward with more grievous matters, although untruly. For hewas reputed little better than a traitor & a professed enemy to their state, whereas indeed both ha & Perseus strove who could complise furprize,& overtake one another better in fraud & avarice. Now there was one Cydes a Cretenit-

Asn inward & most secret friend to Eumenes; this man had communed first at Amphipolis, with one Chimaron a connicionan of his, who ferved under Perfeus in the wars; and afterwards at Demetries conferred with another named Menegrates; also with a certain third person, called Antiochusall captains to K. Perfous even under the very wals of the forefaid City. Over and befides, Eropon who at this time was fent, had beforetime been employed in two feverall embaffies to the fame Eumenes. Thelefecter communications and embaffages were badly spoken of; but no man knew what was concluded between the two KK, Howbeit, thus the cale flood; Emmenes as he had no mind nor intention to war upon Perfeut, fo he was not defirous in his heart that he should have the victory of the Romans; not so much for the old entity which had been between both their fathers, as for the hateful quarrels kindled among themselves. For this concurrence & emu-Blation there was between these two Princes, that Eumenes could never abide to see Perseus for to purchase so great wealth, & so much honour, as he must needs acquire by the conquest of the Romans he law moreover, that Perfeus from the first beginning of this war fought by all means possible for peace, & the nearer he was to danger & damage, aimed thereat every day, more than other; employing his whole fludy & care about nothing elfe. He perceived also that among the Romans because the war grew to be longer than they hoped and looked for, as well their captains as the Senar were well enough content and very defirous to fee an end once of fo troublefome, huxtfull, and difficult a war Knowing thus as he did, the mind and will of both parties, he enclined & framed to that which of it lelfas he thought might fall out, where the ftronger was weary and the weaker in fear : and therein defited he to thew his double diligence, thereby to win a thank & pur-Cchafe favour of both parts. For he entred into bargain with Perfaus for a fum of money one while not to aid the Romans either by land or fea ; another whiles to be a means for peace and to treat with the Romans thereabout, and not to meddle at all in the war, but to fit fill : he capitulated (I fay) for 1,500 talents; making femblance and shew, that for the affurance both of the one and the other ready he was not only to sweat, but also to puttin good and sufficient hostages. Perseus was the willingest man in the world to set in hand with this, as being driven thereto by the exigent of fear; and presently without delay dealt with him as touching the hostages which were to be received: and in fine concluded it was, that they should upon their delivery and receit be sent into Creet. But when they came once to talk of the money aforelaid, he hafted and fluck at that : and to lay a truth, either of these two sums (between Princes of so great name and honour) was but a D base and dishonest consideration; a thing much unsitting(I wis) the giver, and more the receiver; Perseus verily for his part, in hope to purchase peace with the Romans, was willing enough to be at the expence of fo much money : mary, he faid that he would make paiment thereof when the thing was done and accomplished: & in the mean time lay it up lafe for that purpose within the temple of Samothracia, Eumenes again, confidering that the faid Island was an apputtenance to the dominion of Perfens, could not fee but that it was all one for it to lie there and in Pella: and therefore was extrect to have part thereof in hand. Thus between them there was nothing but lying in the wind for the vantage, who could over reach the other: & what was gained in the end but infamy and discredit? As for Perfent, he not only let fall this delign and loft this opportunity, fand that by his pigardice only) when by the means of Eumenes he might have had either his morely fure enough or peacefor it, which indeed he should have bought, if it had cost him the one half of his kingdom,) and being once received into grace & favour [of the people of Rome] he might have defamed and brought into obloquy and danger his concurrent, by charging him to have received a piece of money for a bribe, and so justly have fet the Romans upon his top: but also the association with King Gentius which now was at the point of a contract, was neglected; yea, and a mighty army of Gauls spread at that time all over Illyricum and presented unto him, was even then refuled and discharged by this pinching and saving of his money. For there came and offered their fervice ten thouland horsemen, and as many foot, and those so well practised and so good of sootmanship, that they were able to hold out & keep pace with hotses, yea, and run by their fides thich (I (ay) as when the riders were unhorsed and fain, could vault & mount on the empty horse backs Fready to fight, in their turns. These had bargained to have for pay every horseman ten * Philip. * Philip.  Philip.  pièces [of gold] paid down aforehand, and a footman five, and their Captain a thouland, Perseus. Hummin, 3133 departed from his leaguer lying near the river Enipeus, and with the one half of his own forces than our forest than our forest met these coming upon the way, and caused proclamation to be made in all towns and villages raign from near the high waies, To made ready and bring abroad their provision of victuals, and see that or a ducates there were plenty of corn, of wine, and cattel. Himself brought with him horses and trappings, and fine fouldiers caffocks, to bestow as presents upon the chief of them, with some little sprinkling of gold to deal among a few of them; supposing that all the rest besides of common souldiers; might be drawn on and retained with bare hope. Thus he came to the City of Alamana, and encamped upon the bank of the river Anius, But the army of these Galatians, were lodged about Poludaba in the country of Madica, and reflect there expecting the paiment of the money aforefaid, according to covenant. But Perfeut fent unto them Antigonus one of his gallants and conttiets, to will and command the multitude of the army to diflodge and remove to Bylazora, a place o called in Baronia; and a good fort of their chief to repair unto him. Now were they threefore and fifteen miles from the river Axins and the Kings camp. And when Antigonus had delivered unto them this mandat as he had in charge, and added besides, with what care and dili-! gence the King had laid his provisions by the way of all things in great plenty for the army, and with what gifts of apparell, filver, and horses, he purposed to receive and entertain their Captains H at their first coming unto him : as for that (fay they) we shall take knowledge the too when we are in presence personally: but now for this time, we demand, Whether ye have brought with you in ready coin according to bargain, that gold which is to be paid to the fouldiers, as well horse as foot? And when he could make no answer thereto, but was set nonplas; then the faid Clordiem their Prince, Go your wajes then (qd.he) and sell your King and Matter; that the Gaule unless they may receive the gold, and holtages besides for their security, will not fiir one foor forward, Relation being made hereof unto the K, he called his Council: and when it was foon feen what they all would advise him to do; himself, who could skill better to keep his money together, than hold the royall effate of his kingdom, began to enter into a discourse of a disloyalty and favage nature of thele Gauls; making remonstrance, how he had experience by the calamities and i loffes of many before him, that dangerous it was to receive fo great a multitude of them within Macedony, for fearthe Gauls would be found worse neighbors than the Romans were enemies. Five thousand horsemen are sufficient (qd,he) and so many well we may have good use of in wars, and need not be afraid of them for their number. But every man faw well enough that it was the waging of fuch a number that he feared and nothing elfe : but when no man durit give him counfell albeit he teemed toask their advice, Antigonus was fent again with a meffage untothe Gauk. That the King flood in need of five thouland horiemen and no more; as for all the reft, he weighed them not. When these Barbarians heard that, all the rest began to mutter and grumble, yea, and to take great form and indignation, that they were levied and departed our of their native country for nothing : but Cland cus redemanded, Whether he would make present pay to those five K thousand, according to covenant, yea, or may? but seeing that he was to seek, and made shifts to avoid a direct answer, he let this deceitfull messenger go his waies, and did no harm unto his perfon (a thing that Antigonia himself would scarcely have thought could possibly have been:) And fo after they had given the waste unto those parts of Thracia which lay near to their way, they returned back again to the river/fer. Which power of men it it had passed the straights of Perhabia into Theffaly against the Romans (although Perseus had not stirred at all; but fitten still at Enipeus) might not only have spoiled and laid bare the territory all about, and empeached the Romans for expecting any victuals there, but also destroyed the towns utterly, whiles Perseus held the Romans play at Enipem that they could not relieve and succour the Cities of their allies and confederats Nay, the very Romans should have enough to do to look unto themselves, conside-L ring, that there was no tarrying for them, after that Theffah was loft, which nourished and maintained their army : and pais forward they could not possibly, having the Macedonian camp to affront them. But Perf us by that deed, as he confirmed the hearts of the Romans, so he qualled not a little the courages of the Macedonians, who depended upon the hope and expectancy of their aid By the same milerable pinching of his he estranged also the heart of K. Gentiss from him. For when as at Peda he had paid 300 talents unto those that were lent of purpose from Gentius to receive the same, well content he was that they should seal up that money. Afterwards he sent unto Pantaneusten talents, and commanded him to deliver the same to the K.in person: as for the rest figned up with the leal of the lilyrians, he commanded his own men who had the convoy thereof, ingoing with it to take small journies, and when they were come to the utmost frontiers of Ma-M cedony, there to self and attend the messengers from him. Gentius, after he had received as earnest that imall portion of the whole fum aforefaid, being called upon continually by Pantaucus and fet on to provoke the Romans by some hostility or other, made no more ado; but committed to prifon M. Perpenna and L. Petilius, who chanced at that time to come unto him in embaffage. Which when Ferfeus once heard, he had enough, and thought verily that Gentius had done that, whereby of ne effity he must be forced to wage war with the Romans; and thereupou sent out presently to call those back who had the carriage of the foresaid talents; as if he had studied and sought for nothing more, than to referve as great a booty as possibly he could, for the Romans to enjoy, after that they had vanquished and subdued him, Eropon returned likewise from Eumenes, and wist not what had been contrived fecretly between them. That their treaty was about certain captives, N they themselves had given forth abroad, and likewise Eumenes advertised the Consul so much, for avoiding of all suspition.

Perfeus after the return of Eropon from Eumenes, was much difmaied and cast down, Whereupon, he tent Antegor & Callippus (admirals of his navy) to Tenedos with forty pinnaces, nnto which number five Gallions were adjoyned; who from that coast dispersing themselves all about the Illands Cyclades, might waft and guard the lighters and hoies charged with corn, as they failed to Macedony. Thele ships were put to sea at Cassandrea, and first they sell with the havens that lieunder the foot of the mountain Athor, and from thence paffed to Tenedos with pleasure in calm fea: where finding certain Rhodian open thips riding in the harbour, they spake courteously to Endamus their Admiral, and let them alone without any hurt at all done unto them. But afterwards up- O on knowledge, that fifty hulks of theirs on another-fide were thut up and pent in by the war-fnips of K. Eumenes. (which rid in the mouth of the haven, and were commanded by Damius) he turned about in all haite & dispersed the enemies ships with a sudden terrour that he put them in & fent the faid hulks & veffels of burden into Macedony, with a convoy of ten brigantines to waft them over, with this charge, That after they had conducted them past all danger into place of fafety, they should return again to Tenedas. Afternine daies they retired toward the fleet anchoring then

A in the rode of Sighum. From whence they croffed over to Subota, an Ifland lying between Election and Ather. It fortuned that the morrow after the fleet, was arrived at Subora, five and thirty thips which they call Hippagoge [serving for the transporting of hories] which came from Elea, having aboord certain horiemen of Gaul and their hories, made head toward Phanesa cape or promontoty of the Chians, from whence they might cut over into Macedony. And these were sent from Enmenerto Attalus, Amenor being advertised by a fignall given him from a watch-tower, that those thips were discovered under fail in the open sea, loosed from Subota; and between the cape of E_{-} rythrea and Chios, where the lea is most narrow, he encountred them. The admirals of K. Eumenes thought nothing lefs than that any fleet of Macedonians were abroad in those seas: but imagined one while they were Romans, other whiles, that it was Attalus or some sent back from Attalus, B who from out of the Roman camp were failing toward Pergamus. But as they approached nearer, they took knowledge by the form and fashion of their pinnates, who they were, by their halfy rowing also and making head full against them they were out of all doubt that their enemies were at hand. Then were they mightily afraid as having no hope to refift and with tand them, confidering the ships were unweildy and unhandsome, and the Gauls befides could hardly brook the very lea without any other trouble. Some of them therefore, who were nearer to the firm land faved themselves by swimming to Erythran; others set up their fails, and being cast upon the island Chios, for look their horses, and ran as sast as they could for refuge, to the City, But the barks discharged their armed fouldiers nearer to the City in a more commodious place for landing where the Macedonians overtook the Gauls and flew them; fome in the way as they fled others before C the very gate of the City, being kept out and excluded from thence: for the Chians not knowing either who fled or who purfued, had shut their gates upon them, Nine hundred * Gallogreeks, or * Note that very near, loft their lives and were hewn in peeces, and 200 taken alive. As for the hories, part Gaula, Gaiaperifhed in the fea after the fhips were split and broken, and the Macedonians haught and cut the tians, and Gal-fittings of their gambrels of as many of them as they found upon the shore. Twenty, of, the best logicals and fairest horses, commended that the feature commended that the feature the military of the same fairest horses. and fairest horses, together with the pilloners, Antenor commanded that those ten barks which book; all he had sent before, should transport to The falonica, and return again with all speed to the fleet for though Live that he would expect their coming at Phana. The fleet flaid about three daies under the City remithemenfide, but afterwards went forward to Phane; and when the ten pinnaces aforefaid were returned 14,0 allege, somer than they looked for they set up fail in the Ægean sea for Delois

D In this while the Roman Embaffadors, C. Popilius, C. Decimins, and C. Hofilius, departed from Chalcis, and arrived with three Oninquerentle galeaces at Delor, where they found forty Macedonian pinnaces, and five toyall Quinquetetine galleaces of K. Enmenes. The holiness of the Temple and Island wherein it stood afforded security to them all, so as there was no hurt done nor violence offered from one to another. And therefore, as well Romans as Macedonians, and besides; the failers and mariners of K. Eumenes conversed together, intermingled one with another in the Temple, and the religious devotion of the place, yielded them truce and increase of hostility, Antener the admitall of K. Perfeus, when he was advertised from the watch and sentinell, that certain ships of burden were seen a far off in the sea, set sail & made after them himself with part. of his pinnaces, and part of them he bestowed in wait among the Cyclades, and saving those that E directed their course toward Macedony, he either drowned or spoiled them all. Populius did the best he could, and Eumener with his ships likewise to save some; but the Macedonians, who sailed by night with two or three pinnaces at the most, deceived them and were not discovered.....

Much about this time the Macedonian and Illyrian Embassadors came together to Rhodes, who cetried the greater authority and credit with the Rhodians, by reason not only of the coming of their brigantins, which failed to and fro ranging over the Ægean sea, and among the Cyclades, but; also by the conjunction and affociation of the two KK, Person and Genius, together with a rumor that ran of the Gauls, who were coming with a great number, as well of horse as foot, And now both Dion and Polyaratus, who took part with Perfeus, took more courage and heart unto them e by whose means there was not only a gracious answer returned to the Kings, but also pronoun-I ced openly it was, that by their authority they would make an end of the war: in regard whereof, the Kings also for their parts were to be disposed and well willing to accept of peace.

Now was it the prime of the ipring, when as the new generals were arrived into their Province (es: Amplius the Cof into Macedony; Offavius to the navy at Oreum; and Anicius into Layrin. cum, whose commission was to levy war against Gentius. This Gentius was the son of Plearet u. K. of the Illyrians, and Euridica was his mother: two brethren he had, to wit, Plater of the whole bloud by father and mother both, and Caravarities only by the mothers fide. This half brother he less suspected, by reason of his base parentage from the father; but as for Player he murdered, together with two especial striends of his Estricus and Epicadus (brave men of action) to the endthat he might raign in more fafety and fecurity. The voice goeth that he carried anen ious eye to: Gthat brother of his, for that he had espoused Eima the daughter of Homanus the Prince of the Dardanians; as if by this marriage he meant to make himself strong and combine with the Dardahim nation: and the more likelihood this carried, with it after he married the damotell indeed. When he had made away Plator, and rid himself of the feat that he might have of his brothet, he began to moleft and oppress his own natural subjects: and as he was by nature given to riohree, to that indisposition of his he set on fire with untemperat drinking of wine. But as we laid. before, being moved and incited to war against the Romans, he assembled all this forces together, unco Liffen, to the number of 15000 armed men, and fent his brother from thence with 1000 H foot and 50 horse against the Cavlans, for to subdue that nation either by force or lear, whiles himfelfled his army five miles against the City Baffania from Liffat. Now were the Baffaniane consederat allies of the Romans: and therefore when they were first sollicited by messengers to yield they resolved rather to endure a siege than do so. As for Caragantius he was peaceably and friendly received at his first coming into Durium, a town of the Cavians: but Caranamis, another City, made the gates fast against him: and as he gave the waste to the territory about it, certain of his louldiers stragling here and there, were by the pealants and villagers killed, who came forth and made head against them. And now by this time Appius (laudius having taken with him, over and above his own army. the auxiliaries of the Bullians, Apolloniats, and Dyrrhachians, dislodged, out of the place where I he had wintered, and encamped near the river Genusuus. For hearing of the alliance madebetween Perseus and Gentius, and incensed besides with the outrage committed upon the Roman embassadors, whom Gentius put in prison, he resolved certainly to war upon him, Anicius the Prator being at that time at Apollonia, and advertised in what terms the affairs flood in Illyricum, disparched letters beforehand to Appins, willing him to attend at Genusus for his coming; and so within three daies after came himself to the campthere; and to those aids which he had of his own he took with him two thousand foot, and two hundred horse, drawn out of the youthand flower of the Partins. Of the Infantry Epicadus had the conduct, and Agashus commanded the Cavalry. With this power he prepared to go into Illyricum, principally for to levy the fiege before Baffania: but this defign projected by him, was empeached by a bruit that was blown of certain g pinnaces which wasted and spoiled the sea-coasts. A fleet they were together of eighty fail, sent from Gentius by the infligation of Pantaucus, to forrage the territories of Apollonia and Which being turrendred, they Dyrrhachium. Then the fleet inhmitted also and yielded themselves. And so consequently other Cities of that country one after another did the semblable: and the inclination & disposition of mens minds that way, was much fet forward by the clemency and justice of the Roman Prætor which he used towardall. Then they marched to Scodra, the capital place and feat-town of the war: not only for that Genius had feized upon it for his own felf, as the chief strength and fortress of all his realm but also because it was the strongest peece of all the Labeats nation, and very difficult for access. Enclosed it is with two rivers: to wit, Clanfala which runneth along the East fide of the City, and Barbana on the L Weft, arifing out of the marsh Labeatis. These two rivers joyn in one, and are discharged together into the great river Oriundes: which springing from the mountain Scodrus, and encreased fill with the confluence of many other waters and rivulets, falleth at length into the Adriatick fea. This Scodrus is the highest hill by odds of all other in those quarters : on the east it hath Dardania under it, on the South Maccany, and Illyricum on the West, Albeit, this town was strongly situat, by the natural lite of the place, and defended by the whole nation of the Illyrians and the King himself in person: yet the Roman Prator (encouraged with the good success he had at the first, and supposing the fortune of the totall war would be answerable to so happy beginnings, and that a fudden terrour also would serve him in much stead and prevaile) approached the wals of the town with his army ready embattelled, and displaied his banners against it. Now if they had M thur their gates, and defended their wals and turrets over the gates, with armed guards bestowed accordingly surely they had repulsed the Romans from the walls, and deleated them of their enterprise clean: but they issued forth of the gate, and in the plain and even ground gave battell with more animofity and courage than they maintained it with perfiftance. For being discomfited and driven back, and in the chare hudled by heaps together as they fled, after 200 & above were flain in the veryffraight entrance of the gate, they put the rest within in such a fright, that Genius incontinently sent unto the Prator as Orators, Tenticus and Bellus the principal persons of that nution to treat and intreat for a sur ease of arms, that in the mean while he might debate in counfell and be advited as rouching the main efface of his affairs. And when for this purpose he had obtained a grant for three daies, and the Romanslay encamped from the City halfa mile; Gen- N tius took a barge, and failing along the river Bartana, passed into the lake or mear of the Labeats, as if he had fought some secret by-place to consult in, But as it appeared afterwards, he was moved upon a certain vain hope of his brother Caravantius his coming, who was faid to be near at hand accompanied with many thousands of fighting men, whom he had levied and brought out of that quarter into which he was sent But when this rumonr was over-blown & vanished to nothing down the river he went again with the fiream the third day after in the same vessel to Scodra, and fent courriers before him to the Prætor, requiring leave to per'ey & commune with him; which being granted, he entred into the camp. First, he began his speech with accusing and condemning his ownfolly: in the end his laft refuge was to pour out prayers and shed tears: and so humbling himself at the Prator his feet, he submitted to his devotion. The Prator at the first bad him take 0 a good heart unto him and be of good chear, and invited him to supper: and so he returned to his own people into the City, where he was honorably feasted that day by the Prætor, But afterwards he was delivered to the guard and keeping of C. Cassin, a marriall Colonell: and thus received he of K. Perfeusonly rentalents (a mean reward and hardly sufficient to content a simple wordplaier) to engage himself into a world of danger; and being a K, as he was, to fall into this extream calamity and milety. Anicias having entred upon Scodra, first before all other things took order

A that the two Embaffadors aforefaid, Petilius and Perpenna thould be fought out and brought up. to him ; whom after he had restored to their pristine offate and reputation, he sent Response prefently to apprehend the friends and kinsfolk of the King: who took his way directly to Medeo, & City of the Labeats, and brought with him into the camp at Scodra Elleva the Kings wife, with her two long Scerdiletus and Pleurains, together with Caravantius the K. his brother, Thus Anicias having ended the Illyrian was within the compais of thirty daies, fent Perpennato Rome With tidings of this victory; and within few dairs Gentis; himfelf after him together with his mothers his wife and children, his brother, and other LL, of the Illyrians. This was the only war atchieved and brought to an end, before they heard at Rome that it was beguin.

During the management of these affairs, Perfeurallo was ingreat fear and affright, by reafor B of the comming of L. Lmylins a new, Conful (who as the voice went, marched against him with great menaces) together with Octavius the Prator Neither was he less terrified with the Roman navy and the danger of the sea coasts. Enmenes and Athenagoras had the keeping and command of The falonica with a small garrison of two thousand targettiers, Thither he sent Captain Androsles also, with commandment to encamp close to the very harbor where the ships lay in rode, Unto Ania he sent one thousand horsemen under the leading of Antigonus, to guard the sea-coast, to the end that in what part foever they heard the enemies thips were arrived they might incontinently advance to the fuccour of the peafants and country people. Five thoutand Macedonians were likewise sent to lie in garrison at Pythoum and Petra, under the conduct of Histiaius, Theagenes and Miden. After these were departed, he went in hand to fortifie the bank of the river Enipeus: because it was passable over the very channell on dry foot. And to the end that all the multitude should be employed hereabout, the very women were compelled out of the towns adjoyning to bring victuals into the camp. The fouldiers were commanded from out of the woods near by Finally, the water bearers in leather bits or bottels, were commanded to follow him to the fea, which was a quarter of a mile off: and thereupon they flood to dig pits, some in one place, and some in another, a pretty distance a funder. The exceeding high hils all about put * him in good hope (& the rather because they sent out from them no rivers to be seen "Respectable in open view) that they contained within them some hidden springs, the veins whereof draining of L.P. a. . B. into the sea, were intermingled with the sea-water. They had scarcely funk through the uppermote nythins. course of sand above, when they might see small sources to boil up at the first troubled, but after-D ward they began to yield thier and clear water in great abundance; by a special gift (as it were). of the gods above. And even this occurrent also encreased the name and reputation of the Captain with his fouldiers. Then after he had commanded his men to make ready their armour, himfelf with the martiall Tribunes and the principall formost ranks, marched to recognite and view the paffages; and to fee where the armed men might descend with ease, and where they might with least troublemount up the bank on the farther fide. When he had taken a sufficient survey hereof, he forecast & gave direction aforehand, for all things to be done in the army in good order withour trouble, and tumultuous noise, even at the very beck and commandment of their leaders. For when a thing to be effected is pronounced to all at once, it falleth out that every man is not within the hearing; and so receiving an uncertain fignall and commandment, some put more of their gown head to that which was commanded, and others do less again for it : and so there arise from all parts diffonant cries, and by this means the enemies know fooner whereabout they go, than many of themselves. Therefore to avoid this consuston, he ordained that every marrial Colonell should give a secret watch-word to the principall Centurion of the legion, and round him in his ear what he would have done: then he and so forth every one should deliver unto each Centurion as he is next in rank and place, what was to be executed; whether it were that the commandment was to be carried from the front of the army to the tail, or from the rereguard behind to the vanguard before. He brought up a new order and custome, forbidding the watchmen to carry with them any targets to their fentinels: for that the watchman went not out to fight, whereby he he needed any armour, but to keep watch; that when he descried the enemies coming, he might tetire himself, and raise others to take arms. Item, he ordained that the helmettiers or morioners should stand upon their feet, having their shields upright before them: and when they were weaty, to lean and bear upon their javelins, and resting their head upon the edge of their shields so to take a nap and sleep; to the end that their glittering armour might be discovered afar off by the enemy, whereas himself could not see surbefore him. The manner also of warding in the day time, and of the corps de guard he altered clean. For whereas they were wont to standal the day long armed, and the horsemen holding their horses bridled; it sell out so that in summer daies when or dinarily the fun is extream and scotching hot, both horse and man became weary and languished again with abiding fo many hours in the heat, and oftentimes the enemies being fresh, although they were but few in number fet upon them and put them to trouble and hazard enough. Here-Gupon he commanded that the morning guard should break up at noon, and others succeed in their places for to ward in the afternoon, By this means the enemy fresh and in heart could never take them weary and so charge upon them. When he had pronounced in a publike affembly gatheted together that his will was that these orders should be observed accordingly he delivered unto them a speech, much resembling the former Oration which he used before to the people within the City of Rome. Namely, "That the Generall of an army ought only to foresee and provide for "all that is meet to be done, sometime by himself, otherwhiles with those whom he hath joyned.

" affiftants unto him: as for fuch as are not called to be of his counfell, they ought neither in pub. A ce like nor in privat to shoot their bolts and give their advice. Three things indeed the souldier " was to care and provide for namely, to have a body most strong and nimble withall; his armore and weapons decent and fit; and thirdly, a spirit prompt and ready at all assaies to execute any "commandment on a sudden. For all things else he ought to know that the gods immortall and 66 his Generall willtake care : forasmuch, as in that army wherein the souldiers, the Conful, and chief commander, fuffer themselves to be carried away with rumours and bruits of the common fort, it is not possible for any thing to go well forward & come to good effect. For his own part " (according to the duty and devoir of a captain General) he would endeavour and provide to " give them the occasion and opportunity of brave exploits: as for them, they were not to enquire " after any future thing; but fo foon as the fignall is given, then every man to perform the fervice t of a doubty fouldier and valiant warrior, After these good precepts and instructions, heditmiffed the affembly : and the old fouldiers themselves contessed commonly in plain terms, that they had taken forth a lefton that day as young and raw novices, yea, and learned in military profession that, which they never knew before: neither shewed they only by these and such like words, with what conlent and general liking they heard the Cos. his speech, but also testified the same by prefent deed and visible effect. For immediatly, you should not have seen over all the camp one man idle and doing nothing: some fell to whet and sharpen their swords; others furbished their headpieces, buffs, and beavers: some scoured their shields and bucklers; others their cuitaces and corflets; some fitted and buckled their harnels to their bodies, and tried how they could bestir their limbs and rule their joynts under it : some shook their pikes and couched their javelins; others brandished their swords and lookt that they were sharp at point: So as a man might easily perceive by them. that upon the first occasion presented of encounter with the enemy, they would enter into conflict, either to atchieve a brave victory, or to die an honourable death, Perfeus also on the other fide, perceiving that upon the arrival of the Conful and the begining of the spring together, the Roman camp resounded and rung again with their stirring and rusling of armour, as if there had been some new war towards: that they were dislodged from Phylla and encamped upon the bank just over against him: and that now their leader and commander rode up and down to view and behold his fortifications and works, to spie (no doubt) some way This * encouraged the Ro-* Namely, the or other for passage mans hearts, and danted not a little the Macedonians and their King. At the first, Perfeus endea-L vouted to suppress secretly and stop the bruit and same thereof, by sending out certain of purpose to Pantaueus (as he came from thence) to forbid him in any wife to approach the camp. But by this time were certain children feen brought by their own parents among the Illyrian hoftages: d m was at the and look how much more carefull order was taken to conceal all, fo much the sooner was every thing let abroad and blurred out by the prattle and bubble of the Kings servitors attending about

About the same time the Rhodian Embassadors came into the Rhodian camp, with the very fame charge and commission as touching peace, which at Rome had set the LL of the Senat in exceeding heat & choler; but far worle audience had they in the councill of the camp, & with greater discontentment. And therefore when some advised, that they should be thrust out by head and M shoulders without any answer at all; the Cos. pronounced, That he would shape them an answer after fifteen daies, and not before. Mean while that it might appear what a goody reckoning was made of these Rhodian peace-makers who came about a pacification) he began instead thereof to debate in Councill as concerning the means and manner of making war. Some were of opinion (and principally the elders and ancients) to give the affault, and force the munitions and delences planted uponthebank of the river Enipeus; for that the Macedonians were never able to refift, if they came upon them luftily and charged them by thick troops: for why?' no longer ago (fay they) than the year before, diffeized they had been of so many holds both higher and better fortified and the same holden with strong garrisons. Others were of mind, that Oftavius the Admiral should with the fleet fail to The falonica & by laying waste the maritime coasts, to cut off & wea- N kenthe kings forces; to the end, that upon another war shewed from behind at their backs, the K. might be withdrawn & trained about to defend the heart of his realm and thereby forced in some fort to open & iay naked the passage over the river Enipeus. And Oll avius himself was of this judgment, that the bank as well by the naturall fite thereof, as for the sconces made upon it by mans hand was insuperable and not to be gained: & besides the engins planted every where thereupon, he heard say, that the enemies bad the slight and skill to discharge all kind of shot far better and shoot more dead sure: but the intention of the General Amylius was wholly bent another way: and after he had dissolved the affembly of his Councill, he called unto him the Merchants of the Perrhabians namely, Schanus and Menophilus (men of approved fidelity and wisdom) and of them in great lecret enquired, What kind of passages there were over into Perrhabia? when they an O fwered, That the waies were nothing difficult and dangerous. but only that they were keptand befet by the Kings guards; he conceived some hope that if he assailed them by night with a vallant company, and took them suddenly at unawares before they looked for him, he might chase those garrisons from their holds : for darts, arrows, and all other shor, served to little or no purpole in the dark, when a man cannot see his mark afar off before him; but close sword-fight, hand to hand pell mell, was it that must do the deed: wherein the Roman souldier had no sellow, Minding Atherefore to use those two as guides, he sent for Offavine the Prator: and when he had declared unto him the effect of his defigument, he commanded him to fail with his fleet to Heracles, and to have with him victuals baked and dreffed to ferve a thousand fouldiers ten daies. Himfelf febr out P. Scipio Nasica and Q Fadins Maximus his own son, with five thousand select souldiers to Heracles (as if they were to be embarked) for to wasterhe markime coast of Macedon, lying far within the country, according as it had been before debated in Gouncill a & secretly under hand they were given to wit, that there were viands and victuals in the fleet prepared for them, to the end that nothing should stay their expedition. Then the guides, who were to conduct them in their way had commandment, to to cast their gifts and journeys that by three of the clock in the morning the third day, they might affail Pythoum. Himlelf in his own person the next morrow, B with intent to amuse the K-and keep him from all regard of other enterprises, early by the break of day began to skirmish with the enemies guards in the very midst of the chanell and place of the current. The light armour and forlorn hopes as well of the one ideas the other, maintained the fight: for it was not possible for souldiers heavily armed at all peeces, to skirmish in the chanell, so uneven as it was. The descent from the banks on either hand to the forelaid chanell, contained fomewhat less than three hundred paces, or little better than a quarter of a mile: the middle space of the stream between shollowed and eaten with the current, in some place more, in others less) took up little above a mile. For this prefent needless it is and bootless (flabiding as we'do now) "arranged in order of battel) to tell you what motives they be, that induce me to think it better " to be quiet and not to ftir this day : another time demand the reasons thereof : and reft cohien-"ced I advise you, with the authority and credit of an old warrior and experienced Captain. The young man was blank and said not a word: perswaded he was doubtles, that the Cossaw lone impediments to flay the battel, which to himself appeared not. Paulus, which he perceived that the camp was let and quartered out, & the carriages beltowed accordingly, drew first out of the rereguard the Triarii; then afterwards the Principes, whiles the Haffati of pikes kept their flanding ttill in the vanguard (if haply the enemies should offer battel;) at the last he withdrew then alto, beginning first at the right point, taking by little and little the fouldiers from every enligh one after another. By this means were the footmen had away without any trouble and tumult, and the horsemen together with the light armour opposed against the enemy in the front and head of the main battell before the enemies: neither was the Cavalry called back from thele flations wherein they were placed, untill the fotefront of the rampier and trench was fully finished. The K, likewife, who without any refusall of battel had flood ready that day to fight, contenting himself with this that he knew the flay thereof was occasioned by the enemy, led his companies back into his camp, After the Romans were encamped and well fortified, C. Sulpitius Gallarga thattial Colonel of the second legion, who had been Prætor the year before by permission of the Consul called the fouldiers to a generall audience, and before them all declared and pronounced, that the next night it following there would be seen an eclipse of the moon, from the second hourt of the night untill the fourth: and this he did, because no man should wonder thereat, as if it were a prodigious token. Also he made demonstration unto them, that it might be well fore-known and fore-told, because it is a thing coming at certain times by the ordinary course of nature. For like as they nothing marvelled at the rising and going down both of fon and moon at fer hours, nor to lee the moon lometimes shine bright out at the full otherwhiles in the wain, giving light only with the small tips of her horns: even so they ought not to make a wonder and miraculous matter of it, that the should be dark, when as her body is hidden by the shadow of the earth. Thus the moon was eclipfed at the hour before prognosticated, overnight before the teaven of the Nones of September: by occasion whereof, the Roman souldiers held Gallas for a deeply learned sage, and a di-L vine Philosopher: but contrariwite, the Macedonians were troubled with the fight thereof, as an heavy prodigy, portending and prefaging the ruin of that realmand the utter defiruction of the whole nation. And furely the houling and yelling which they made in their camp all the while, untill the moon recovered her full light again, was a very prognoffication and prediction of no lefs, The morrow after both the armies were so hot let and greedy of fight, that both K, and Col. were blamed by some of their own souldiers, for that they went out of the field the day before, and firnck not battell, As for the K, he had his excuse and desence ready not only because the enemy refused the fight first, in open view of all men, and so retired his forces into his camp, but also in that he had pitcht and ranged his enigns in such a place, unto which the Macedonian battell, called Phalanx, could not advance. confidering that with the malleft disadvantage of the ground, M there is no use at all thereof. The Cof, for his part, as the day before he icemed to have pretermitted and loft the opportunity of a combat, yea, and to have given the enemy advantage to depart in the night-feason (if he had so lift) so now also he trifled out the time making semblance of factifice, whereas the fignall of battell at the point of day was put forth for the fouldiers to enter into the field Well, at the last, when the sacrifice was duly performed; about the third hour of the day, he assembled his Councill about him; where, some there were that thoughthe prolonged the time on let purpole, with his discourses and unseasonable consultations, and spent that opportunity so, which should be employed better in fight and execution of some worthy exploit. Howbert, after some speeches passed, the Cos, made an Oration unto his souldiers in this wife. After this oration all kept filence, partly for that many of them were won to his opinion and partly because they feared to find sult to no purpose & so to give offence, which thing howsoever once past cannot be recalled and amended. But that day neither, was there. battell fought, for any great defire that the Conful or King had thereto. The King wished it not? because he was now to charge his enemies, not weary of their way as the day before, nor tronbled about their embattelling in such fort & hardly at the last brought into order. The Consula-Gain had no great fromack thereto for that his camp newly pitched, was provided neither of fewell nor forrage brought in and laid up already : and for the purveyance thereof, out of the villags and fields near at hand, many of the fouldiers were gone abroad forth of the camp. And shue when neither of the Generals were willing thereto, mere chance and fortune (which is more powerfull than all the counted and policy of man) made means and gave occasion of a battell. There was a river not very great, near to the enemies camp, wherear both Romane and Macedoni-Witered : and on either bank fide certain guards kept their ft tions for the lafery and fecunity as well of the one part as the other, Two Cohorts there were for the Romans of Marricines and R Pelignians, footmen; two troops or cornets besides of Samnit horiemen; all commanded by M. Sergim Sylm a lieutenant. Over and besides, another standing corps de guard quartered before the camp, containing three cohorts, namely, of Firmian, Vestine, and Cremonian footmen, together with two troops of Placentine and Effernian horsemen, all conducted by lieutenant Claving, Now when all was well and quiet about the river, and no fide provoked or challenged other; it formned that a sumpter horse of the Romans about the sourch hour of the day brake from the hands of those that had the tending and keeping of such, took the river and made toward the bank of the farther fide : & when three fouldiers followed after crofs the water almost knee-deep to catch him, the Thracians began to train the jade from the midft of the river to their bank fide: but after one of them was flain, the Romans recovered the beaft again & retired to their own guard Now I there was a firong corps de guard of 800 Thracians upon the bank which the enemies kept, from whence some few at first, taking it to the heart that a countriman of theirs should thus be killed before their face traversed over the river in pursuit of those that had flain him; afterwards more and more, and in the end all followed after, and together with that guard : * leadeth to the battel, Men were moved with a reverence of the ma jefty of his place, as he was L. General; also with respect of the honour and glory of the man otherwise; and above all, with the regard of his age: for that being about threescore years old he did undergo the offices and patts of young men in the adventures of greatest travell and danger. That void space which was between the light targettiers, called Cetrati, and the thick battaillons named Phalanges, the legion took up clean, and broke within the battell of the enemies, Behind the Cetrati was this legion, and had af- K front them the Pavoisers called Aglashides, with resplendent or shining shields, L. Attilius, who had been Conful beforetime, was commanded to lead against the battaillon of other Pavoilers called Loucaspides with white shields. And that was the main battell of the enemies. Against the right flank from which quarter the skirmish first began about the river, the Elephants were conducked together with a wing of confederat horsemen, and from thence began the Macedonians to fly. For like as many new devices and inventions of menacarry fome shew in apparance of words when they are first spoken of; but come to practise and try them once, and not to argue and dispute how they should be put in execution, they vanish away without effect and prove just nothings even foat that time, the Elephants bare a name only in the battell, without any use and fervice at all. That violence of the Elephants (such as it was) the Latine allies seconded immediat-L ly, and forced the left flink to retire. Then the second legion was put forth, and in the midst entred upon the Phalanx and put it to flight; neither was there any cause of victory more evident than this, namely, that many skirmishes there were in divers places, which at the first troubled the Phalanx, and afterwards discomfitted it. True it is that to abide the force thereof it is unpossible, so long as it keepeth close united together & putteth forth their sharp pointed pikes bent thick couched together brest-high: but if a man by charging the same here and there, force them once to turn about those pikes, which for their length and heavy weight are unwieldy and hard to guide they foon are intangled and catch one within another untowardly: but in case it fall out so, that there be any tumult made either affank or behind then there ensueth a generall trouble and confusion of all, as if they all at once came tumbling down: like as it hapned then, when as against the Ro-M mans, who affailed them by troops in fundry parts, they were driven to break their battaillon into many pieces as it were and so to make head & affront the enemy. But the Romans espied where there was a breach made and lane left between, and there they would infinuat and wind in with their ranks and files: who, if they had runupon the front of the Phalanx close ranged altogether with their whole battaillon, they had enwrapped and entangled themselves within their pikes: which in the beginning of the conflict happed to the Peligni, as they unadvifedly dealt with the targettiers, called Cerrati) and had never been able to sustain that battaillon united thick and conched together. But as there was a cruell flaughter committed upon the companies of the infantry in every place, fave only those that flung away their weapons and fled; so the souldiers of the Cavalry departed in manner sase and sound out of the conflict. The K himselewas the first manthat N fled: and now by this time was escaped beyond Pydia, and with his cornets of horsemen which they call, Sacred made halte to Peda. Anon after followed Coffacus, and the Cavalry of the Odryfians confequently, other troops and companies of Macedonian horsemen departed and kept their arraies unbroken: for that the Phalanx or battaillon of the footmen between which kept the conquerours occupied in execution, put them quite out of remembrance to pursue the men of arms. A long time continued the maffacre of this Phalanx afront, affank & behind. In the end, they who escaped the hands of the enemies, & fled without weapons to the sea; some took the water, and firetching forth their hands to them that were abourd in the ships, most humbly belought them for to fave their lives: and when they faw the small pinnaces and cockboats making apace on all hands toward them from the ships, they imagining that their coming was to catch them for their O prisoners rather than to kill them outright, waded farther into the water, yea, and some swimmed forward: but when they faw they were by them of the boats flain in all hollile manner like enemies, as many as could, fwam back again to land : where they met with a foiller mischief; and were worse plagued than before: for the Elephants (driven by their governours to the shore) trode them under foot and crushed their guts out. All men generally agreed in his point, That never a any one field, were somany Macedonians deseated and killed by the Romans: for 2000 men

A were there flain, and to the number of 6000 (who fled to Pydna out of the battail) came alive into the enemies hands; 5,000 befides were taken pritoners, as they fled feattering and dishanded here and there. Of the victors, there died not above an hundred, and the more part by far of Pelignians; but a greater number somewhat, were hurt and wounded. And if the battail had begun foonet, that the winners might have had day enough to follow the chase upon their enemies, all their forces had been utterly defeated and deavoured by the sword: but now the night coming upon them, as it covered and shadowed the enemies that fled, so it caused the Romans not to be To hally and forward in pursuit; considering they were not acquainted with the coasts of the countrey. Perfeut fled to the forrest Pieria by the port rode way, with a great number of horimen and his royal train about him. So foon as he was entred the forest where the way divided into B fundry and divers parts, leeing that the night approached, he turned out of the high beaten way with very few of his most loyal and faithful friends. The horsemen being thus abandoned and lest destitute of their leader, slipt some one way and some another home into their own Cities: cerrain of them (but very few) recovered Pella before Perfeus himself, because they rode a direct and ready way. The K, was much troubled and vexed until midnight almost, what with fear and what with difficulty to find out the way. When he was come to Pella, Enclus the Governour thereof. and the Kings pages, were ready attendant at the court to wait upon him and do him fervice : but contrary-wife, of all those friends who escaped fase out of the battail and chanced by variable adventures to come into Pellasthere would not one come at him not withflanding they were oftentimes lent for. Three only bare him company in that flight of his, to wit, Evander of Crete, Neon Ca Bootian, and Archidamus the Etolian. Fearing therefore left they who refused to come unto him, would foon after enterprise some greater matter against him; with those three he fled fill forward, about the fourth watch of the night. After him therefollowed upon 500 Cretenfians. Toward Amphipolis he went; but he departed in the night from Pella, making all the haft he could to pass over the river Axim before day-light, supposing that the Romans would give over the chase there, by reason of the difficult and dangerous foord.

The Conful being returned into the camp with vistory, (because he should not have the fruition of sincere and perfect joy) was greatly disquieted and troubled about his yonger son, and then was P. When the bruit and news of this battail was arrived at Amphipolis, and that the dames and wives of the City ran flocking into the Temple of Diana, whom they call Tauropolos, to befeech and call for her aid, Diodorus the chief Governor of the City, fearing the Thracians (who were 2000 in garrison) lest in that tumult and garboil they would spoil and rifle the City; craftily suborned a fellow on fer purpose in guise and shew of a letter-carrier, and received from him letters in the mids of the market place: wherein it was written, That the Roman fleet was arrived in Ema-Ethia, and that the territories all about were picifully wasted by them; and therfore the rulers and captains of Emathia requelted him to fend a garifon to succour them against these foragers. When he had read these counterfeit letters, he exhorted the Thracians to undertake this expedition and to go into Emathia for to guard the coasts thereof: giving them to understand, that considering the Romans were loofly stragling and scattered about the fields and villages, they might make a foul havock and flaughter of them, and besides raise and bring away with them a great boory withall, he forgat not to elevate almuch as he could, the fame of the forfaid unhappy field fought, faying. That if all had been true, there would have been messengers coming thick one after another upon their flight, to bring fresh tidings still therof. Under this pretence he sent away the Thracians; and to foon as he law they were passed over the river Strymon, incontinently he shut the gates. The third day after the battail fought, came Perfeus to Amphipolis, and from thence be sent; Orators to Paulus with an herald of peace. Mean-while Hippias, Midon, and Pantaucus the Kings principal friends, went themselves to the Consul, and surrendred unto the Romans Berrhad whither they had retired and fled immediatly out of the field. Then, he removed necres unto the sea, and lodged about Pydbas First, Berybas; (as is beforefaid) yeelded, then moved necres unto the sea, and lodged about Pydbas First, Berybas; (as is beforefaid) yeelded, then the standard Pedias and Consequently, all Maccalony well necre within two daies was surrendred. But the Pydneans who were next unto him, as yet were behind with sending their Embassadors: the reason was, for that the consuled consulence thither of many nations, and the disordered multindept that the standard of the consuled where all met there together, hindred the counsel and consum of the whole Cipy so as a first of the standard standard

Perfeus, whose only hope was in the aid of the Bilates whom he had affaied and sollicited, and H for which purpose he had sent his Embassadors (although in vain) held a publick assembly, and bringing his fon Philip with him, came forth before the people; to the end that he might by some exhortation confirm and threngthen the hearts, as well of the Amphipolitans as the companies of foot and horse, who either at all times continually had sollowed him, or were retired thither by flight for refuge. But ever as he was about to make a speech unto the audience (which he oft began to do) he could not proceed for tears. Now for that himself was not able to speak, he came down from the pulpit, and imparted unto Evander the Cretenfian those points, which his will was to be delivered and propoled unto the congregation there affembled. The multitude, as they lamented and wept again to fee the King to piteoully shed tears so they regatded not the speech of Evander: nay, some of them were so bold as to cry out aloud from the midst of the assembly, A. I way, away, and get ye gone from hence that the smal remnant of us here perish not for your lakes. The flour resolution of these men stopped Evander his mouth, that he could not say a word and reply again. The King by this time was gotten to his lodging, and having conveighed into certain bottoms upon the river Strymon all his money, gold, and filver, went also in person down to the water fide. The Thracians durst not go aboord and commit to fea, but flunk every man away to his own home; and so did all the fort of souldiers besides. The Cretensians only (for greedy hope of gain) accompanied the King, who because in sharing & dealing money among them, he should incur more offence than win thanks laid out fifty talents among them upon the river fide to framble for. When they had made quick riddance and a clean hand with it they went aboord in a great burry to as one barge overcharged with a multitude of pattengers was cast away and funk in the K mouth of the river. That very day they arrived at Galipfus, and the morrow after at Samothrace, the very place that they intended; and thither (by report) were conveighed 2000 talents. Pau-Lu after he had fent prefidents to govern every City furrendred, to the end that no injury should be offered in this new peace to the conquered, and detaining with him still the Kings heralds and Orators, not knowing any thing of the Kings flight and departure, fent P. Nafica to Amphipolis with a mean regiment of foot and horse, to ruinat and destroy at once Sintica, and also to empeach all the designments and enterprises of the Romans.

In this time Melibaa was forced and ranfacked by Cn. Oftavius : but at Aginium (to the fiege whereof Cn. Anicius the Lieutenant was fent) 200 men were lost by a fally made out of the town, for that the Æginians heard not the news of the late defeat. The Conful departed from Pydna with his whole army, and the morrow after came before Pella. Where having encamped within a mile of the City, he made abode there for certain daies to view on all fides the fituation of the City, which he perceived and marked full well, to have been chosen not without good cause for the imperial seat of the Macedonian Kings. Situat it is upon an hill that lieth to the Southwest enclosed found with mears so deep as they cannot possibly be waded and passed though: and these marishes are bred and sed both winter and summer by waters overflowing out of certain lakes. Within the very marish next unto the City side, there standeth a strong Tower by it self, bearing up above the rest, as it were an Island raised upon a terrace made with exceeding labor of mans hand, which terrace both sustaineth a wall, and is not hurt with the moissure of the marish round about it; and a far off seemeth close joined to the City wall. How- M beit, divided it is by a river between it and the wall, and yet united to the City by a bridg over it: so as who loever affaileth the same without, can have no access any way to it neither, if the King be disposed to shut and enclose any man within, can he possibly make an escape and get forth but over the faid bridg; which a few men may keep and guard with ease. In this place the Kings treafure used to lie, but at that time there was no more found but the 300 talents which were sent to King Gentius first, and afterward staid and detained. During the time that the Consui remained about Pella in his standing camp many embassages had audience given them, who repaired thither out of Theffaly especially to congravulate with him, testifying their own joy and wishing his, But the Conful after that he had intelligence that Perfeus had croffed over to Samothracia, departed from Pella, and at the fourth gift and journey that he made, came to Amphipolis. The whole mul- N titude went forth of the City in great numbers to meet him, which gave testimony to every man, that neither a good nor just King

Hinging Fabing, L. Leptulus, and Q. Netetllal, the messengers of the late victory, albeit the financial state of the position of the joint of t herof to have prevented them: for the fourth day after the battail fought with the King even as the playes and games were exhibited in the flow-place, there was heard inddain-y at first, a complete hunting noise, which spreed over all the companies of the spectators. That a field was fought in Macraem and Perfess vanquished: afterwards arose a more cleer and evidence voice, which grew at length to an open thout and clapping of hands, as if certain news had been brought of the laid victory. The magistrats wondred hereat, and made fearth after the author of D this lo fuddain gladnels, but none would be found : and then verily it passed away as the momentany joy of fome vain and uncertain occurrence: howbeit a joyful prefage of fome good luck fetled in mens hearts and remained behind. But after that this was confirmed by the true report and relation of Fabius, Lentulus, and Metelling, which they made at their coming, all men rejoyced as well at the fore-giving of their minds, as for the victory it felf. This joyous conceit of this affem-bly in the fliew-place, is reported otherwile, and carrieth with it no less probability and likeli-hood of truth, in this manner, Upon the " 20 of September (which was the second day of the so-lemnity of Romans games), as, the Copini was going up to the lists for to set out the running of Calendar Ollo-tic third was the second as the copini was going up to the lists for to set out the running of the second seco the chariots, a post, by report, (who said he was come out of Macedony) presented letters unto him decked with lawrel. The Conful then, so foon as he had set on foot the race, presently mounted up E into his own chariot : and as he rode through the shew-place toward the common scaffolds, lie thewed into the people the faid laureat letters; which being once feen, the people presently (for-getting all their sports and fights) ran out into the mids of the circue, at thither the Co. assembled the Senatiunto whom when he had read the letters, by the advice and allowance of the LL, even before the publick stages and scaffolds, he published the contents therof to all the people in this manner, That L. Emplins his colleague had fought a fet field with K. Perfeus, That the army of the Macedonians was discomfitted and put to flight, That the King himself was fled with some few of his train, and that all the Cities of Macedony were subdued and brought under the subjection of the people of Rome. These tidings were no sooner heard, but there arose a shout with exceeding great applaule, in fo much as many men there, left the fight of thele disports, and carried thele joyful news home to their wives and children. This was the thirteenth day after the battail given in Macedony, The morrow after the Senat affembled in Curta (Hoffilia) and ordained it was that publick processions should be solemnized an Act also passed, that the Consul Emplius should dismiss all those that had taken the military oath, excepting only the sea-fouldiers and mariners and as for the discharging of those souldiers, agreed it was, that it should be moved in the Councel-chamber. when the Lieutenants were arrived and come from L. Emplius the Conful, for they had dispatched a courrier with letters before them. Now these messengers aforesaid entred the City the * 25th of *ed. Stat. Ca September about the second hour of the day, and drew after them a mighty train of those who en- lend. Offobrid. countring them upon the way wherefoever they went accompanied them to Rome and fo directly went to the marker-place and tribunal feat. In fortuned that the Senators fat then in the ordinary G Curia or Councel-house, and thither the Consul brought the Embassadors. Where they were received and held to long only as they might declare these points. How great the Kings forces were, as well infoot as horse; how many thousand were slain, how many taken prisoners; what small lois of Roman fouldiers that great defeat of enemies coffshow few they were in number that the King fled with that it was supposed he would pass into Samas bracia; that the fleet was in readines to make way after them in chase; and that it was not possible for him to escape either by Land or

Sea. And then anon they were brought forth before the general affembly of the people, where they made relation of the same. And then the joy was renewed upon proclamation made by theH Conful, That all the facred temples and churches should be fet open; and that every man should depart out of the affembly to render thanks unto the Godsiin such fort that all the temples of the Gods throughout the whole City were replenished with mighty multitudes and congregations not of men only, but also of women. Then the Senat met again in the ordinary Caria and ordalned that publick processions and thanks should be made for five daies rogether in all Churches and Chappels and at every Altar for the happy and fortunar success of L. Emplines, and that great ter head of beafts should be killed for facrifice. Also that the ships which rid ready rigged and well appointed in the river Tybern for to be lent into Macidony, in case it had to fall our that the King had been able to have refified) should be retired and drawn to land, and so laid up differ their docks and arienals: also that the mariners should be casted, after the receiv of a whole years pay, I and together with all those who had sworn to serve the Cobsul, should have their conge and pasport to be gone, Item, that all the souldiers in Corerra, Brundufium, about the Adriatick sea, or in the territory of the Latinats (for in all thefe there was an army fet in readines, whereith C. Licinius if need required should have succoured his colleague) should have their discharge. Also proceffions were published in the full affembly of the people; to begin from the tenth day of Office ber, and foto hold on five daies after.

Out of Illyricum also two Lieucenants or mellengers, to wit, L. Licinius Nerva and P. And then Agepolis the principal person of them spake in this manner, "That the Rho-"dians had fent them in deed as Embassadors to treat about an accord & to make peace between et the Romans and King Perfeus, for that this war as it was grievous and prejudicial to all Greece, o it could not chuse but be chargeable and hurtful to the Romans themselves, But saln out it is " paffing well through the goodness of fortune, that the war is ended otherwise : and hath given "them to good an occasion and opportunity, to rejoyce and testify their joy in the behalf of the L. Romans, for the archievance of so brave and notable a victory. Thus much spake the Rhodian. And then the Senat made answer again, "That the Rhodians had sent that embassy not regarding "the good and profit of Greece, nor yet for any care they had of the expenses defraied by the Ro-"mans, but only in love and favor of King Perfeue, For if they had been respective unto them (as they would make semblance and have the world to think) they should have addressed their Em-"baffadors when as Perfens invaded Thefsaly with an army, & for two years space perfected and " plagued the cities of Greece belieging fome, & frighting others with menaces of warryet all that " while not a word with the Rhodians as touching peace. But after that they heard once that the Romans were mounted over the fireights and paffed through into Macedony; that King Perfeus " was shut up and enclosed sure enough for starting any way, then and not before, they could lend M an embaffige for no other reason in the world but to rid and deliver Perfeus out of that imminent "danger which threatned him so neer hand. Paulus Emplius the Conful lying encamped (as is aforefaid) neer Syra in the Odomantidian territory, when he saw the letters from King Perseus brought unto him by three Embasiadors of base condition, wept (by report) himself, to consider the stailty of this world, and the fickle state of mans life; to fee (I fay) that he who erewhile could not rest content with the rotalty of Macedany, N but would needs war upon the Dardanians and Illyrians and levy the aid of the Bastarnians, was now after the loss of his army, as one exiled out of his own Kingdom, driven into a small lland, where, like a poor suppliant he remained in surety, not by means of his own forces, but through the religious protection of a fanctuary & priviledged place. But when he read the superscription of the letter with this stile. King Perseus to the Conful Paulus, greeting, he could no more pity him, for thinking of his blockish folly in that he had no sence and feeling of the calamity and misery wherin he flood. And therfore albeit the contents of the letter other wife were praiers fo demis and abject as little favoured of a princely mind, yet was that embaffage dismissed without answer and without letters. Perfew foon perceived what title it was that he must lay down and forget now that he was vanquished: wherupon he addressed other letters in quality of a privat person with O out any other addition at all: and by those as he craved, so obtained he likewise, that certain agents should be sent unto him, with whom he might parley and commune as touching the state and condition of his present sortune. Sothreedelegat Embassaders were sent unto him, namely ?. Lentulus, A. Posthumius Albinus and A. Antonius, Bot nothing was effected in this agency or Embassage; whiles Perfess stuck hard and laboured all he could to hold still and keep the roisi name of King, and Paylus endeavoured contrary-wife, that he should submit himself and all that he had

of Spain, after he had forced and won Marcolica a renowned and famous City in those parts,

A to the protection and clemency of the people of Rome. During these debates and affaires between them, the fleet of Cn. Octavius was arrived at Samothrace, who also presenting before their eyes fearfull objects of terror, went about to force him as well by threats and menaces, as to win him by hope of fair intreaty and good usage to yeeld and submit; and herein he found some help by means of an occurrent, either hapning by chance and meer adventure, or contrived by mans device of fet purpole. L. Attilius a noble yong Gentleman, perceiving that the people of the Samothracians were met in a general affembly, requested of the Magistrats that he might be permitted to make a short speech unto the people. Good leave he had, and then he began in this wife; "My "mafters and friends of Samothracia, I would gladly know, whether it be a falle fable or a true tale "which we have heard, That this is a facred lland, and the foil therof holy and altogether inviol-B "able? When they all accorded in one confent, that the Iland was as holy and facred as it was re-"ported: How is it then (qd. he) that a murtherer hath violated and polluted it with the blood " of King Eumenes? And confidering that in all preambles and prefaces of facred and divine fervice "premifed, they are commanded precifely to avant from the ministery thereof who have not pure "and innocent hands; will you suffer in deed your most secret fanctuaries and devout tabernacles " to be stained with the bloody body of a thief and fellon? Now was it a rife report and common bruit in every Gity of Greece, That K. Eumenes had like to have been murdred at Delphos by Evander. The Samothracians, befides that they faw their whole Iland and the faid Temple to be in the power and puissance of the Romans, took these reproofs and reproaches to touch them neer, and not without just cause: whereupon they sent Theondas, the soveraign migistrate (whom they call Ctheir K. Junto King Perfens, giving him to understand, "That Evander the Cretenfian was charged "with murder: also that by custom and tradition from their ancestors, they had full power and " authority to proceed by order of law, against all those that were presented and endited for en-"tring within the liberties and facred precincts of the Temple, with unclean and unpure hands "Now if Evander stand upon his innocency, and knoweth himself cleer and unguitty of the capital "crime laid to his charge, let him come to his aniwer and plead his cause for his own defence, and "he shall be heard: but if he dare not hazard the judicial tryal of the issue, retire he and departs "that he pollure nor the temple; let him shift for himself and escape away. Perseus called forth Evander unto him, willing him in no case to try the process of justices for neither would his cause justify him nor any favour bear him out. He much feared withal, left being cast and condemned, The would bewray Perfeus himselfand appeach him for the setter and author of that so horrible a fact and no way then but one even with patience and resolution to take his death. Evander gainfaid nought in outward appearance, but pretending in words, that he had rather dye by a cup of poilon than upon the (words point, fought fecret means to flie and be gone. The King upon advertilement hereof, fearing left the Samothracians would discharge their anger upon him, as if he had wrought his evalion to avoid due punishment, commanded Evander to be made away and killed, After which murder committed thus rashly without al advisement, he be thought himself & considered, that he should be touched deeply with the same spot of guilt that Evander was noted with: namely, that as Eumenes was by Evander wounded at Delphos, to Evander by him was murdered in Samothracia; and so the two most holy and religious temples in the world were stained Eand polluted with mans blood; and who but he the cause and contriver thereof? But the blame of this foul fact of his, was by the corruption of Theondas quite averted another way; and he for a fum of money bare the people in hand, that Evander was his own hangman. But Perfeus by this lewd and derestable act, committed upon the person of the only friend whom he had alive, (so well approved and tried by him in so many adventures, and now betraied for his labour by him, unto whom he refuled to be a traitor) estranged clean the hearts and affections of all men from him : fo as nowevery man ranged with the Romans. Thus abandoned as he was and left to himfelf, they forced him to cast about and devise how to escape and be gone. Whereupon he called unto him Oroandes the Cretenfian, a man that knew well the coasts of Thrace (because he had negotiated and traded in those parts;) and with him he dealt to embark him in some small soist, and ploto conduct him into Cotys. Now there was a certain bay under a promontory of Thrace, wherein a pinnace flood in readiness: thither, after fun-fetting were all things brought for necessary nies and money withal, as much as closely cold be conveighed. The King himself at midnight accompanied with three persons (for no more were privy to this his flight) went out at a postern or back dore of the house, into a garden neer his bed-chamber, and so with much ado having clambred over amud wall, passed to the water side. Now was Oroandes already loosed from the foresaid creek, for so soonas the money was once brought thither into the vessel, he lanched into the deep, and let his course for Candy. Perfeus, after that the bark was not to be found in the bay, walked and wandred a good while along the strand: and searing at last the day-light approaching (yet not so hardy as to adventure back again to his lodging) lurked behind in one side of the temple close Guntoa blind corner and nook thereof. Among the Macedonians they called those the Kings pages who were the Princes and noble mens fons, cholen to ferve and wait upon the person of the King, That company yet followed after the K, in his flight, and as hard as the world went, departed not from him until such time as by the commandment of Cn.Octavins, the publick cryer pronounced with a loud voice. That the Kings pages and all other Macedonians besides in Samothracia, if they would turn to the Romans, should enjoy with safety of life their estate entire, their liberty free, and all that ever they either had about them, or was left in Macedony. At which proclamation once published, they all immediatly revolted to the Romans, and entred their names with C.P.off - H humins, a martial colonel. Likewife Ion of The falonica, delivered into the hands of Ollacius the yong infants of the King, and not one of them all was left with Perfeus, but Philip his eldelf fon: and then he yeelded both himself and that ion into the hands of Octavius, Crying out upon lortune, and blaming the Gods in whole Temple they were, for that he received no aid and fuccour from them, notwithstanding he humbly craved and belought the same. Then commandment was given, that he should be embarked in the admirals ship: and thither also was brought abourd all the money that remained, and then forthwith the fleet retired to Amphipolis: from whence Offiwissent the King to the camp unto the conful, but first he had dispatched his letters to give him knowledge, that he was sure enough under his hand, and that he was at the point to be brought unto him. Panins, reputing this for a fecond victory, (as it was no less indeed to be effected) presently upon the receit of the message, killed beatis for sacrifice : and when he flad called his councel about him, and read the letters of the Pretor beforethem, he ient Q. Alins Tuberoto meet the K, upon the way, and commanded the rest in good frequency to remain in his capital pavillion, and give attendance upon him. Never was there feen before, fo great a multitude to un out for to fee any folemn fight or pageant. In their fathers daies King Syphax was taken prifoner and brought into the Roman camp; who befides that there was no comparison between him and Perfeus, either in regard of his ownname or the renown of his nation, was then also but an acceffary as it were to the Punick war, like as Gentius now to the Macedonian. Perfeus was the very head of this war, neither was it the fame of his father and grandfire only (whom he neerly touched in birth and blood) that made him renowned, but the resplendent glory of Philip and Alexan- K der the Great, who brought the foveraign empire and monarchy of the whole world to the Macedonian nation. Well, Perseus entred the camp arrayed in a black cloak, without any one of his own train to accompany him, who partaking his milery, might cause more compassion to behad of him. The affluence of the people was so great who went out to see him, that for the very prese he could not march forward, untill such time as the consul sent his sergeauts and hu ishers to void the thronging of the multitude, and make way for him to go to the conful his pavillion, Theconful arose, and (giving commandment to the rest forto sit still) advanced forward a little, and raught out his hand to the King as he entred into the pavillion; and when he bowed and debased himself to his very feet, he took him up again and would not suffer him once to touch his knees, but led him into the tent and caused him to sit down right over-against those whom he called thi-L ther to councel. The first question that he demanded of him was this; "What wrong he had " fustained at the hands of the people of Rome, that he should be constrained to enterprise and be-"gin the war against them with so malicious a mind as he did, and so to hazard himself, his whole if thate and Kingdom, in such extremity of danger? And when every man attended what answer he would make, he staied a good while without utterance of one word casting his eyes wistly upon the ground, and shedding tears withal, "Then spake the consul again: If you had been but "yong (qd. he) when you came to the crown, I would verily for my part marvail the less, that you "Thould be to ignorant as not to know how important it was, to have the people of Rome either "for a friend or an enemy : but now, fince you both had your hand in that war which your father " waged against us and also could not chuse but remember the peace afterwards made with him, M "and which we observed most faithfully, What policy was it for you to entertain war rather "than peace, with them, whose force you had tried in war and whose fidelity you had found in peace? Whenas he would yet make no answer at all either to question or acculation, the conful went on and faid: "Well, how foever these things are thus fall out and come to pass, be it through "the error and frailty of man by adventure of fortune and hard hap, or fatal necessity of the desti-" nies, be of good chear yet, and take a mans heart unto you: the gracious clemency and mercy of " the people of Rome, well known and proved in the missoriunes of many Princes and States, af-"foord unto you not only hope, but certain affurance of fafety. Thus much spake he to Perfers in the Greek tongue: then, turning to his own affishants and company about him, he directed his speech to them in Latine as followeth. " A notable example and rare mirrour you see (qd, he) of N the changeable variety of this world: to you I speak especially, my masters here that are sreft. "and youthful gallants in the heat of your yong blood. And therefore let no man in time of his " prosperity, carry himself proud and violent against another, nor yet confidently to trust upon " the present state wherein he is, for who knoweth what may hap once yet before midnight? But " him alone will I hold for a man of valour indeed, whose heart neither the gentle gale of this fawning and flattering world is able to lift aloft nor yet the bluftering blafts of frowning fortune cast down or dash upon the rocks. After the conful was risen and departed, he committed the charge and custody of keeping the King to Quintus Elius. But forthat day Perfeus was not only invited courteoufly to sup with the consul, but respected also in all kind of honor, as possibly might be done unto him in that state and condition of his.

After this the army was divided here and there into garrifons for the winter time. The greatest part thereof was received into Amphipolis, and the other cities neer adjoining entertained the reft. This was the end of the war between Perfeus and the Romans, which had endured four years one after another continually: and here an end withal of the most flourishing Kingdom of the greatest part of Europe and of all Asia, Perfeus was counted the twentieth King after Caranus, who was the first that raigned there. This Perfeus began his raign that year wherein Q Felities

A and L. Manlins were Confuls, In the time of M. Junius and A. Manlins Confuls of Rome, the Senat entituled and honoured him with the name of King, and eleven years his raign continued The name of these Macedonians was very obscure and base, untill the daies of Philip the son of Amyntas. From that time and by his means it began to grow and wax great: howbeit, contained it was within the compass and precincts of Europe, comprehending all Greece, and part of Thrace and Illyricum. Afterwards it spread into Asia, and in thirteen years space, during the raign of Alexander, it subdued and brought under subjection, first all those parts whereunto the empire of the Persians extended, which was an infinit dominion in circuit: alterwards it reached to Arabia and India, even to the end of the earth, bounding and confining all about upon the red fea. At that a time was the monarchy and name of the Macedonians the greatest in the whole world, but upon the death of Alexander, distracted it was and divided into many and fundry Kingdoms. And whiles each one endeavoured & strove by force to draw unto him more and more puissance, they difmembred and rent the whole: & so from the highest top & pitch of prosperity, brought it down to a most base and low condition, after it had continued in good estate a hundred and fifty years, When the bruit of the Romans victory was blazed and blown as far as to Afia, Amenor who with a fleer of barks and pinnaces rid in the harbour of Phana, failed from thence to Caffandrea, C. Popilius, who was in Delos to guard and waft those ships which were bound for Macedony, after he heard fay that the war in Macedony was brought to an end, and the enemies veffels removed our of their rode, dismissed also for his part the Athenian ships, intending to go forward in his voiage c for Agypt, to accomplish that embassage which he had taken in hand : to the end that he might encounter Antiochus, before he approached the walls of Alexandria, As these Embassadors coasted along the river of Asia, and were arrived at Loryma (a port somewhat more than twenty miles distant from Rhodes, and fituat just over against the city) the principal States of Rhodes, met him in the way (for now by this time was the fame of this victory flown fofar) requesting him to set sail thither and there to land: for that it concerned their city much in fame and reputation, yea, and was expedient for their good and safety, that they should be made acquainted with all that either had been done or was now in hand at Rhodes, and so to make report thereof at Rome upon their own knowledge, and not as things were voiced by the common bruit. They refused a long time; but in the end they were so importuned, that content they were to fail a little farthet, and spend n fome small time for to gratify and benefit a city affociat unto them. When they were come to Rhodes, the same principal citizens aforesaid urged them instantly with much prayer and entreaty to come into their general affembly of the people. The arrival of those Embassadors rather augmented than empaired the fear of the city. For Popilius made rehearial there in open audience, of all which had been done or spoken (sounding any way to hostility) either in particular or in general by them, during the late war. And being as he was, a grim fir, tough and fierce by nature, he aggravated all that he spake, with his sour visage and sharp language, like an accuser at the bar : insomuch as they might well conjecture and guesse, how the whole body of the Senate stood assected unto them, by the bitterness of one only Senator, who otherwise for himself had no occasion of particularill will and malice against the city. But the speech of Decimins was more temperat, who said, withat the blame of those imputations for the most part which were objected by Popilius was not to be laid upon the people, but upon a few perions, who had follicited and stirred the multitude: for those having their congue at hire, and using to speak for gain, had made decrees full of flattery to please the King, and sent such embassages, as the Rhodians at all times were no less ashamed than repented of. All which practifes of theirs no doubt would fall upon their heads who were faulty, in cale the people had the government and rule in their own hands. Audience he had with great affent and applaule; not more for elevating the fault and trespais of the common people, than for laying the weight upon those that were the authors culpable. And therefore when the chief men among them made answer to the Romans, their words, who went about to excuse and salve in forme fort as well as they could the articles objected by Popilias, were not so well taken, as their speech who accorded to Decimius, in delivering the guilty persons and offenders to be punished according to their demerits. Wherupon there passed presently a decree, That all those who might be convicted of any deed done or word spoken in favour of Perfeus against the Romans, should be condemned and have sentence to lose their heads. Some of these persons were departed out of the city upon the coming of the Romans, others laid violent hands upon themselves. These Embassadors or delegats having fo journed no longer than five daies at Rhodes, departed and made fail for Alexandria. And notwithstanding their absence, the execution of judicial proceeding was no less hotlyfollowed at Rhodes, according to the decreemade in their prefence. For the moderation and gentle cariage of Decimins was the very cause that they persisted resolute, and gave not over untill they had gone through with it, and dispatched all. G Whiles thele affairs were thus managed, Antiochus after he had affaied in vain to force the walls of Alexandria, was departed from before the city, & having possessed himself of all Egypt besides. and lest the elder Prolomans at Memphis, (for whose behoof he pretended by his own forces to reconquer the Kingdom, to the end that foon after the conquest obtained he might set upon him likewise) withdrew his army away into Syria. Prolomans for his part was nothing ignorant of his designment and intention, making sull account, that whileshe kept his youger brother affrighted with the fear of fiege, by the help of his fifter he might be received into Alexandria: confidering withel, that his brothers friends were not oppoled against him, first he sent note his sister, afterwards to his brother and his friends, and never gave over to write and fend, before he had H concluded and established a peace with them. The thing that made him to suspect Antiochus was

These things wilely forecast and seen by the elder brother, were received with assent of the yonger and those that were assistant about him: and the sister between stood in very good stead, not by her good advice and counsel only but also by her effectual praiers. And therefore by a general accord of ail, a peace was concluded, and the elder Ptolomans received into Alexandria, without any gain- T faying or relistance at all so much as of the very multitude; not with standing that during the war they were much decaied and weakned (not only by the fiege, but also after it was raised and the army gone from Alexandria) for want of all things, by reason that no provisions were brought thither from out of Egypt. Now, where as Antischus should have taken great contentment and rejoyced much for this, in cale he had brought his forces into Egypt for to reflore Ptolomeusinto his own eltate (which was the goodly pretence and colourable shew that he made to all the States of Afia and Greece, when he received their embassages, or sent forth his letters into all parts) fo it fell out, that he was to highly offended and displeased hereat, that he went in hand and prepared to make war now against them both much more eagerly and with greater malice than before against one alone. Presently he rigged and sent out his navy at sea to Cyprus; himself in personat K the beginning of the fpring minding to invade Egypt, marched forward with his army as far as into Cale-Syria. The Embaffadors of Ptolomaus encountred him in his journey about * Rhinocolura, and gave him thanks in behalf of their K. and mafter, for that by his means he had recovered the inheritance of his fathers Kingdom: requesting withal to maintain that benefit and good deed of his, to declare rather by word of mouth what he would have done, than deal by sword in hand and force of arms, and not of a friend and ally to become a mortal enemy. His answer was, that he would neither callback his fleet nor withdraw his army upon any condition, unless he quit unto his use as well the whole Isle of Cyprus, as the City * Pelsfum, together with the territory about the mouth of Nilus, called * Pelusiacum Oftium. And therewith he set him down a day, before which he expected to receive his answer as touching the accomplishment of the said conditions. After the day prefixed for the truce was past, as they failed in the mouth of Nilus neer Pe-Infium, the states along the deserts of Arabia yeelded. Then, being received of them that inhabite about Memphis, and the rest of the Ægyptians, partly with favor and good will and partly for sear and constraint; by small journies he descended toward Alexandria. When he was passed over the river at Leusine (a place about 4 miles distant from Alexandria) the Roman Embassadors met him upon the way. After greetings and falutations at their first coming, he put forth his right hand to Pop lius; but he delivered unto him a scroll written, and willed him before he did any thing else to read that script. After he had read the writing through he answered that he would devise with his friends and confider what was best to be done. But Popilius according to his ordinary blunt manner of speech which he had by nature made a circle about the King with the rod that he had in his M hand, and withal, "Make me an answer (qd. he) I advise you such as I may report to the Senate, before you pass the compass of this circle. The King aftonied at this so rude and violent a commandment, after he had staied and paused a while : I will be content (qd, he) to do what soever the Senat shall ordain. Then and not before, Popilius gave the King his hand as to a friend and ally. Afterwards when Antiochus was departed out of Egypt by the day prefixed, the faid Embass. or delegats having by their authority established concord also between the two brethren (who as yet were not throughly agreed) some of them failed to Cyprus, and from thence they lent away the flect of Antiochus, which already had given an overthrow in battail to the Ægyptian ships. This was a noble embassage and much renowned among those nations, for that thereby Egypt was undoubtedly taken from Antiochus, who was as good as possessed thereof already, and the N inheritance of the Kingdom restored again to the race of Prolomens.

Of the two Confuls that year, like as the one was famous in his place by this notable victory, fo the other was little or nothing spoken of, by reason he had not matter of any great exploit to emploied in. And first of all when he was assigned a certain day for the legions to meet, he entred into the temple without the lucky approbation of the auspices. And when the Augurs were moved and their advice required thering they declared, that there was an error committed in the appointment of the said day. In his voiage for France he kept his standing leaguer for the summer time about the mountains Sicinisma and Papisus, near the plains called "Macri. And afterwards he wintered about the same places with the allies of the Latine nation. For the Roman legions because the day was not rightly appointed for the assembly of the forces at the Rendets-vous, remained behind at Rome. Also the Pretors, save only C. Papyr. Carbo, unto whose lot Sardinia was salo, went forth into their Provinces: and him the LL. of the Senate had ordained to attend upon his civil jurisdiction at Rome between citizens and forrainers. Popilius likewise, that embassage which was fent to Antiochus returned to Rome: where he made relation that the controverses between the two Kings were decided & the army of Antiochus retired out of Egypt into Syria, After this, came the Embass, also of the Kings themselves. Those of Antiochus made report that the King their master

A master essented more of the peace approved by the Senat, than of any victory what loever; and obeied the orders for down by the Roman Embassadors, no less than the very messengers coming with commandments directly from the foods; and sinally they testissed their own contenuments and wished them great loy of their victory obtained saying that he King himself would have been, with all his power with a chieving thereof, in case he had been enjoined to perform any service. The Embassadors of Persons in the name jointly of their King and of Cleopara, included thanks must them, a knowledge themselves more bound a beholden to the Senat and people of Romes, than to their own parents, yea, & more than to the immortal Godsfor by their good means skey were first delivered from the most lamentable miseries of a free, and had secovered their sathers Kingdom, which they were at the point to have lost for ever. The Senat returned this answer selected him, and in so doing, he highly contented and pleased the Senat and people of Romes, family Prolomatus and Cleopara the King and Queen of Agyps, had sound any goodiness and come modity by them, the Senat was very glad therstore and rejoyced thereat and would endevour and work it so, that they might be periwaded that the people of Rome. This said, the Pretor Cl. Paprini had in charge to see that presents and glin ance and lateguard of their realm, rested at all times most in the saithful protection of the people of Rome. This said, the Pretor Cl. Paprini had in charge to see that presents and glin to the Embassadors according to the ancent custome. Then were legicts brought out of Madedony to redouble the joy of the pideony, importing that Person was sure enough in the hands of the Consul.

When those Embassadors were dismissed and gone, much debate and argument there was between the Embassadors of the Pisans and Lunenies. They of Pisacomplained that they were diefeized & driven out of their territory by the Roman coloners : contrary wife those of Luna plainly averred, that the Land in controverly had been fet out and affigned for them by the Triumvits. The Senat herenpon fent five men as commiffiguers to make inquitition into the limits of the faid territory and to determine accordingly, and those were Q. Fabius But a, P. Cornelius Blasso, T. Semponing Massa, L. Naving Balbus, and C. Apaleus Saturfinas. There came likewise a solemnem-busing sent in common from Eumenes, Assalus, and Asbenaus, all three brethren to notify the joy and concentrates which they took for the Romans victory. Moteover, L. Manling the treatnest was ready at Precedit to receive and welcome Majgabathe fon of K. Majanifa, as he should disbark and fer on land: for fent, he was of purpose with money to meet him upon the way, to conduct bim also and bring him to Rome at the cities charges. He was no sooner come, but immediatly andience was given him in the Senat, "This yong Prince foake in such fort, as the things which of "themselves were acceptable enough indeed, he graced and made more worthy of acceptance by " his good words. He rehearfed what forces of foot and horie both, how many Elephants, what " quantity of corn for that four years space (during the war) his father had sent over into Masses. But two things there were for which he was dismared and could not thuse but blush: the contact has been by their Embass, had made request unto him and stor commanded father to "furnish them with necessaries for the war : the other, that they had sent them mony to pay for "their corn, For Majanifa was not forgetful, but bare well in mind, that he held his Kingdom as "fift conquered for him, afterwards augmented and amplified many waies unto him by the people of Romes and for his own part, he could content himself with the use and occupation therof, "as a tenant in fee-farm; acknowledging the propriety and possession thereof to be in them, who "as Lords of the fee feoffed him therein, Good reason therefore and meet it was that they also "hould be bold with their own to take and not to ask to have and not to crave, much less then "to buy the commodicies & fruits affuing out of the lands by them demited given & granted As for Majanifa.fufficed he was, and evermore would reft concerned with that overplus which the people of Rome might leave and spare for him. Thus much (qd,he) I had in charge and commisfinn from my fathers own mouth, when I departed and took my leave of him: but afterwards: ertain horinen tiding post overcook me, so let me understand that Macedony was subdued; and to charge me, that after I had fignified our joy in your behalf. I should shew unto the Senat, that my father took such contenument therin, that he would gladly come to Rome to offer facilities "and render thanks to Imp.op. Max. in the Capitol: which to do he requested leave of the Senat, lo temight fland with their good liking, and be no trouble unto them. The Prince received this answer from the Senat That his father Masanifia did as beseemed a good man and thankful perfonfo to do, in giving such a grace and Honor over & above; to benefit of duty required. Moreover that the people of Rome acknowledged how they had received great help at his hands in the Punck war by his valiant and loial service; as well as he obtained his Kingdom through the favour of the people of Rome, yea, and afterwards according to equity and justice, had born himfelf right worthily in all forts of devoirs and duties during the wars of three Kings one after another, Neither wasit any marvel at all that he rejoiced at the victory of the people of Rome, beings King who had engaged hazarded and entangled all his own fortunes and the whole efface. of its Ringdom with the Roman affairs. As for tendring thanks to the Gods for the victory of the people of Rome let him do that himfolf in his own house at home; for it should suffice, that his fon for him performed that duty at Rome. That he and his father both had sufficiently for their parts tellified their joy. As for Mafauifia in proper person to leave his realm and depart or to of drick, over and besides that it was in no wife profitable to himself, the Senate deemed it not expedient for the weal-publick of the people of Rome. Malgaba further-more requested;

This dispute and debate passed between them; mull at last they gressed his point; that of the four City tribes, they should cast lots openly in the Hall and Closifier of Theories for one tibe, in which all they should be registred and comprised, who had been villains sometimes and wereepfrom hiled. Now this lot fell to the tribe Exquilanca. Then Tib. Gracehar pronounced, That orchaned it was to enrolin it all the Libertins. Great honour and reputation with the Senat gained L the Cenfors by this act: Semproblius likewife wan much thanks cherefore Decause he had perfifted conflantly in that good enterprise to well commented: and Claudiul went not without his die thank, for that he was no hindrance to this proceeding. In this review and furvey taken by the Genfors, more Senators were removed and put out of the coentel, year and more Gentlemen commanded to fell their hories of iervice, than by other Centors in former time. And all those by both of them joynely were not only displaced out of their tribes, and made no better than Erarii (i, to lose their voice) but also to pay all taxes what over to the numoft. And look who was noted and digraced by the one, had no relief nor hope to recover his credit and place by the other, Now when these Censors demanded, That according to a custome and ordersthey might be allowed a years space and two months, to look into the reparations of the public kedifices, that M they were maintained wind-tight and water tight; as also to fee whether they who had undertaken to finish certain works at a price, had performed their bargain accordingly: Cn. Tremelius a Tribune interposed himself and denied this demand; for anger that he was not cholen and taken into the Senar. The fame year C. Cicereius dedicated a Chappel in the Albane mount, which he had vowed five years before. Also that year was L. Posthiming Albinus enstalled a Flamine of Mars. The Confuls Q. Elius and M. Janius propounded in the Senate, as touching the government of their Provinces: and the LL ordained, That Spain should be divided again into two Provinces, which had been united in one during the Macedonian war: also that the same L. Paulin and L. Ameins (hould defend and keep in obedience as before, Mecedony and Mysicum, untilfuch time as they by the advice of certain deputed commissioners; had both composed all matters and affairs disordered and troubled by the wars; and also resormed the estate of that realin; by inducing it into a new form. The Provinces affigued unto the Confuls were Fife and Gal, and they had the command of two legions of footmen, and four hundred horsemen apeece. The Pretos had their lots for government as followeth: The civil juridiction over citizens fell to Q Coffee, and over ftrangers to M. Juvencius Talva: Tib. Claudius Noro was L. deputy of Sielly Co. Fulvins of the bither Spain, and C. Licinius Nerva of the farther : laft of all, A. Mantius Torquatul was appointed to the government of Sardinia; but into his province he could not go, by occalion that lie was detained at home by vertue of an act of the Senat; to make inquisition into certain fellonions and capital crimes. After this, confunction there was in the Senat as routhing the prodigies which were reported. The chappel of the Penares (protections of the City in Pelians imitten with thunder and lightning. Also in the Town Miner whing two gates and a good part of the wall felt the like harm, At Anagnia it had rained earth, and in Lanubium there appeared in the skie a burning flame, Moreover, M.Valerius a citizen of Rome gave knowledge, that in Ca-Tarsa within the publick territory of that City, for the pare of three flaves and two nights together, blood gushed out in his chimney hearth where he kept fire: and for this strange fight above all the reft, the Decemvirs were commanded to have recorde unto the books of Sibylla: who proclaimed a publick supplication of the people for one day, and sacrificed fifty goats in the common market place of the City. Also in regard of the other prodigies, a supplication was holden another day, and men did their devotions at every altar of the Gods; greater beafts were killed for facrifices, and the City was folemnly cleanfed and purged. This done, as touching the honor of the immortal Gods, the Senat ordained, that for almuch as the two Kings Perfeur & Gentius their enemies were overcome, and now at the devotion of the people of Rome, together with Mace dony and Illyricum, Q.Cassim and M. Juventine the Pretors should give order for as great oblations to be offred unto the Gods at every shrine and altar, as had been heretofore (when App. Classdim and M. Sempronius were Conjuls for the defeat of King Antiochus, Then they ordained certain delegats, by whose advice L. Paulse and L. Anicise the two Generals, might set all affairs in B order, namely, ten into Macedony, and five into Illyricum. For Macedony were nominated A. Polihumins Luscow and C. Claudins, (who both had been Centors) C. Licinius Craffus, late companion to Paulin in the Confulthip, and who at that present had the government of Gaul continued him. To these delegats above-named, men of Consular dignity, all by their calling, were adjoined in commission Cn. Domitius Enobarbus, Ser. Cornelius Sylla, L. Junius, C. Antistus Labeo, T. Numisses Tarquiniensis, and Aulus Terentius Varro. For Illyricum were these named, P. Elius Ligin, one that had been Conful, C. Cicereiss and Cn. Babiss Tamphiles (this Babiss had been Pretor but the former year, and Cicereius many years palt) P. Terentius Tuscivicanus; and P. Marilins. Then the Confuls being advertised by the LL, of the Senat, that (for a simush as one of them must succeed C. Licinius in Gaul, who was nominated one of the delegats) they should part their Pro-C vinces between them either by accordand agreement, or by lot make choice of the fortune of lottery. So Pifa fell to M. Junius (but before he went into his province, he had in charge to bring into the Senat, those embassies which from all parts were come to Rome for to declare their joy in the behalf of the people of Rome) and Gaul to Q. Elius.

Albeit fuch personages were sent, as by whose sage counsel good hope there was, that the chief commanders of the Roman armies would pass no decree unbeseeming either the clemency or Majesty of the people of Rome, yet debated it was in the Senat about the sum and principal points of all their counsels and defigns; to the end that the laid Legats might cary unto the Generals all things plotted already and begun to their hands at home in the City. In the first place ordained it was, That the Macedonians and Illyrians remain free and enjoy their liberties, that all nations of D the earth might fee, that the drift of the Roman armies and forces was not to bring free states into servitude, but contrary wife to reduce those that were in bondage to liberty, to the end that those nations which now enjoied freedom, might be secured under their safeguard and protection both of furety and of perpetuity, and fuch as lived in subjection under the Kings, might both for the present time find their government more mild and righteous for that respect which the Kings have of the people of Rome; and also, if it fortuned hereafter, that there foould be was between the people of Rome and their Kings, they might be affured that the iffue of those wars would bring victory to the Romans, and procure liberty to themselves. Also agreed it was that there should be no more farming out of the metal mines in Macedony, albeit, they yeelded a great revenue; nor yet of publick lands and possessions in the countrey: for possible it was not that these matters Ethould be practifed and followed without publicans; and where those intermeddle & have ought to do, then it must needs follow, that either the publick right and prerogative of the State be annulled, or the liberty of allies come to nothing, Neither were the Macedonians themselves able to exercise the same: for look where the ministers and managers of any thing see a booty presented before their eyes, there, occasions of sedition and contention will never be wanting. Moreover, concluded it was, that there should be no common and general counsel of the whole nation, for lear lest at any time the lewd vulgar people having by the Senat liberty granted unto them tending unto a good and wholfome moderation and equality of the State should abuse the same and draw it to a mischievous and pestilent licentionsness. But they thought it good policy to divide Macedony into four quarters and counties, that each one might have their several counsel? likewise is Fwas supposed to stand with good reason and equity, that they should pay the one moity of that tribute which they were wont to yeeld unto their KK. Semblable commission and like directions they had for Illyricum. As for all other matters, referred they were to the discretion of the Genetals and the Delegat commissioners, who might be better able to determine more certainly of particulars, according to the occurrents presented unto them in the managing of their affairs.

Among many and fundry Embassadors of Kings, nations, and states, Attalm the brother of K., Eumenes most of all others amused mens minds, and drew their eyes upon him: for by them who had born arms together with him in that war, welcomed he was much more heartily, and receired with greater courtely than if Eumenes the K. himfelf had come. Two occasions there were outwatelly pretended, and those carrying a good shew of honesty and credit, which brought him to Rome: the one, a gratulation or testimony of joy, (as meet it was) for that victory, wherin himself enthis helping handsthe orher, a complaint of French tumultuous wars and the bloody hostility of Advorta their King, by which means his brothers Kingdom was in great jeopardy. But there by another thing hidden underneath namely, an inward and fecret hope that he conceived of home nors and rewards from the Senat, which hardly he could feem to aim & reach unto, without fome whindness and violence offered to brotherly duty and affection. For some there were even of the Romans also, who did him no good, but gave him bad countel, drew on his appetite with fair hopes, and fet him a longing, feeding him with thefe and fuch like concerts, That in Romethis H was the opinion entertained of Attalus and Eumenes, as if the one of them were a friend fast and fure to the Romans; the other anally, found and faithful neither to the Romans nor yet to Perfeus: and therefore hard it were to fet down and fay, Whether of the twain would be more eafily obtained at the Senats hands, namely, a fuit made in his own name for his preferment, or a demand of some hard course against his brother: so bent were all men in general to grant any thing to Attalus and to deny every thing to Eumenes. Attalus (as the sequel and proof shewed) was pliant to thole persons whose defires reach at all that hope promiseth, had not the sage admonition of one friend come between to bridle his affections, ravished and transported to as they were with the amiable aspect and fawning flattery of his own good fortune. He had about him at that time one Stratius a Phylician, fent by Eumenes (who refted not fecure of his brothers loyalty to Rome, I of purpole for to lie in espial and observe all that Attalus did: and to advise him faithfully, if he saw him tread awry and practife ought against his duty and allegeance. When he came unto him he found his ears already possessed, and his spirit tempted and sollicited beforehand: howbeit taking his times and waiting opportunities, he went roundly to work and fluck to it close until he had fet all up again which was at the point to run on end, and fall to the ground, He alledged and laid these remonstrances before his eyes, saying, "That Kingdoms have grown mighty, some by one means, some by others: but as for theirs, being but newly erected, & grounded upon no strength of ancient boundations, it stood upright only by the mutual concord of him and his brethen in that one of them beareth the name and title of King, wearing the diadem and crown alone upon . his head, but in effest all three brethren be KK, As for you Analus (qd, he) who are the eldeft K brother fare one, who is it that reputeth you for less than a King, not only for that he feeth you fo mighty at this present, but also the next heir apparant, and without all doubt like shortly to "reign indeed? coni dering the feeble body and crafy age of Eumenes, who hath befides no iffue of "children to succeed him in the roial throne? (for as yet he took no knowledg of him that reigned afterwards.) What need then is there to nie violence, and to force that which of its one ac-" cord will shortly be devolved upon you & fall into your hands? Moreover, a new tempest and "florm is riten of French wars, threarning peril unto the realm, which it will be hard for you er Princes to withstand, agree as well as you can in all brotherly love, unity and concord, But ifto forra n war abroad, there should arive a domestical and civil dissention between you at home. what remedy then but utter ruin and destruction? Now truly to fav nothing of the unhappy and miferable issue of such graceless and wicked brethren deliveered unto us in fained fables, you see what a goodly fair end Perseus is come unto, who being in the Temple of Samothracia, was constrained lying prostrat upon the ground to prostrate himself at the feet of the enemy his conqueror, the crown and diadem which he came unjuftly by even with the unnatural murder of his own brother: as if the Gods in heaven had been there prefent, to require due punishment for his horrible fact. To conclude, they also themselves, who in no "triend y love and affection to you, but in rancor and hatred to your brother Eumenes, have put N these designs into your head, and prick you on to execute the same seven they. I say, will praise your kindness, your piety and constancy, in case you persever rue and trusty to your brother, to "the very end. These and such like important perswasions prevailed with Attalus and seiled deeply in his mind. Therefore being admitted into the Senat, after he had wished joy unto them, and protefied his own for the late victory, he laid abroad and declared his own demerits and good fervice in that war, the favors also (such as they were) done by his brother, and last of all, the revolt of the Gauls lately broken out with great troubles and commotions. His petition to the Senate was, for to fend their Embassadors unto them, by whose countenance and authority they might be reclaimed, and so lay arms as de. Having declared this message which concerned the profit in general of the realm; he made a special suit for himself, and demanded to have Enwand Muronen given unto him. And thus, when he had put them befides their hope, who thought verily, that after he had accured his brother he would have required the kingdom to be divided peecemeal & dismembred, he departed out of the Councel house, Seldom had been known at any time before any man whatfoever, King or subject to have had the like audience with so great favour and applause of all men, as he: received and entertained he was right honourably with gifts & prefents of all forts whiles he was at Rome, and with the like they accompanied him at his departure.

Among many Embassies of Asia and Greece, the Rhodian Embassadors were most marked and looked upon throughout all the City: for whereas at first they were all trim and goodly to be seen in their white and bright apparely as decent it was for them that would feem to congratulate for the victory (for if they had wormblack or been poorly arraied, it might have been confirmed, that they mourned for the missortune and calamity of Perfeut) after that M. Junius the Conful brake with the LL; of the Senar (and all that while the faid Embassadors flood without in the common place Comitium) to confider and advise, whether they would allow lodging, presents, and give audience in the Senat unto them: they resolved and were of opinion to observe no rights not cu's fomes of hospitality with them. Then went the Conful out of the Senat : unto whom when the Rhodians faid that they were come to rejoyce in their behalf for the late victory, and withal to Banfwer in the name of their City to certain crimes wherewith they were charged, requelling that they might speak before the Senat and be heard with indifference: the Consul pronounced aloud unto them, That the custome indeed of the Romans was, to entreat their allies and friends gracioully, and among other matters of courtefy and hospitality which they afforded unto them, to grant them also a day of hearing in the Senat; but the Rhodians had not demeaned themselves during the war, in such fort, as to be reckoned in the number of lovers and associats. At the hearing of thelewords they cast themselves all prostrat on the ground, beseeching the Consul and all those that were present not to suffer that falle imputations of late surmited should against a I reason prejudice the Rhodians more, than their good deferts of old (whereof themselves were fuffi iene witnesses) stand them in stead. And presently after they had put on simple apparel and mourning C weeds, they went about from house to house visiting the principal persons of the City, humbiy befeeching them with tears, to hear their cause before they were condemned. M. Juv nows Talva the Pretor or L, chief justice for the pleas between citizens and strangers, was the only agent that provoked and incited the people against the Rhodians: nay, he had promulged and published a bill to this effect, That war might be denounced against the Rhodians; also, that out of the Magiftrats for that year they would make choice of some one to be lent as Admiral with a fleet for the managing of that war: hoping that himself should be the man. But this action and proceeding of his was croffed by M. Antonius and M. Pomponius, two Tribuns of the commons, Over and befides, the Pretor, to say a truth, had broached this matter after a new and flrange fashion, and to the evil example of future times, in that he preferred a bill unto the people of his own head D alone, without asking the advice of the Senat, or making the Confuls acquainted there with: and that inthis manner and form, Pleaseth it you, and is it your will, that war be proclaimed against the Rhodians? whereas alwaies before-time, in question of war, the Senats advice was first taken! and then the thing was proposed unto the people. Likewise the Tribuns of the commons for their part, did more than they might, and athing not warrantable by any precedent, For it was a cultom and tradition observed ever of old, that no person should interpose his negative to cross any bill, before that privat men in particular had their course and turn granted, both to periwade or difswadethe same by which means many a time it fell out, that even they who never protested nor meant to oppose themselves, being moved and induced by the reasons of those that stood up to diffwade, and perceiving also by them the inconveniences of such a bill, would step between and E dash all: yea, and contrary wife such as came of purpose to cross and nip the same being convinced by the authority and born down by the important arguments alledged by those that enforced the faid bill, would defift and furcease. Thus the Pretors and Tribuns strove much who should do every thing more unleasonably than others. The Tribuns impeached and staid the hastines of the Pretor, interposing their negative before the time, and deferting the matter untill the coming of "Whether we have " Thebegin, "transgressed and offended yea, or no, that yet remaineth doubtful: but sure we are of this, that was got this "we infer all punishments and shameful ignominies already that can be devited. After their oration in this manner uttered, they fell down again all profitat, and as humble suppliant estioons put forth and shook their branches of the olive, until at length they were raifed up on their feet, and so departed out of the Senat. Then began the LL within, to give their opinions and pais their ieniences of them. The heaviest enemies and most maliciously bent against the Rhodians, were those, who had conducted the war of Macedony, as Confuls. Pretors, or Lieutenants but M. Porcius Cato was their only patron that flood to them and supported their cause right earnestly; a man otherwise by nature sowre and severe, but as then he shewed himfelf a mild and gracious Senator. I will not infert here the lively portraiture and refemblance of r that copious and eloquent person, by relating the flowing speech which he then delivered this very oration is extant in writing, and contained in the fifth book of his Origenes. In fine, the Rhodians received fuch an answer, as they neither were concluded enemies, not yet remained in the nature and quality of friends. The principal perions of this their embassage, were Philocrates and Allymedes. Ordered it was & agreed between them, That Philocrates (with some of his fellows) should report this answer at Rhodes; and that Asymedes (with the rest) should stay behind at Rome, to to know what was practifed and done there, and give intelligence thereof accordingly to their citizens at home. For that present the LL, of the Senat gave them in charge, to remove their Captains and Governours by a certain day out of Lycia and Caria. These news related at Rhodes, importing matter (init self considered) of grief & heavinels, turned into joy, in regard that they were eafed from the fear of a greater mischief, for they doubted fore that they should have had hot war. And therfore presently they ordained for the Romans a crown amounting to the value of 20000 pieces of gold, and with this prefent they fent Theodorns the Admiral of their navy in embassage, A will and defire they had to make fuit unto the Romans for affociation: but fo, as noact and ordinance of the people fhould be entred therof, nor any infitument engrofied as touching it. And this they did, to avoid the greater shame and ignominy of repulse, if haply they missed of their purpose, and could not obtain. The Admiral alone had this priviledg, and was permitted to treat of that matter, without any bill at all either published or enacted by the people. For in so many years before they had continued in amity with the Romans in such fort, as they never linked and tied themselves unto them by any formal deed and covenant upon record, and that for no other reason in the world, but becau'e they would neither cut the hings off from all hope of their aid, if haply any of them might fland in such need, nor disable them elves of the possibility they had to reap fome fruit & receive good of their bounty and prosperity. But surely at this time (me thinks) they ought to have fought fadly and in good earnest for their ociety, not so much for fafety and fecurity against others (for none they seared at all but only the Romans) as to be sid of the suspition and jeatonly which the Romans had of them. About the same time the Caunians also revolted from them, and they of Myl. fa took certain Towns of the Euromestians, Now were the heates of these Rhodians within the City not to much broken or abared, but they faw wellenough that it the Romans took from them Lycia and Caria all the rest would either by way of re-vanced jointly with their united armies against them. Whiles these affairs thus passed there, whiles some occurrents sell out in Macedony, and others likewise at Rome, L. Anicius having subdued King Gemius (as is beforefaid) and brought him under his own hand placed a garrison in Scod a the Kings roial feat, and appointed Cabinius the Cap. N cain thereof: but in Rhizon and Olcinia two commodious cities of good importance he ordained C.Licinius the Governor. Having thus made over the rule of Illyricum unto these twain, himself with the rest of the army went into Epirus. Where the Town Phanota was the first that yeelded unto him and the whole multitude of the people came forth to meet him with their intules in token of submission. After he had put a garrison in this place also, he passed over into the countrey of Moloffis, where he received the furrender of all the Towns thereof, excepting Paff aron Tegmon, Phylacum, and Horreum. And then he led his army first against Paffaron. The principalmen and sulers of that City were Antinous and Theodotus, men of mark and name, as well for thefavor they bare to Perfeus, as the hatred they caried to the Romans: the only persons who had counselled and periwaded the whole nation to revolt from the Romans. Thele two having guilty consciences o within them for their privat trespass and being past all hope of finding any grace and pardon, shut the gates of the City, to the end that they might perish with the overthrow of all, and be overwheemed with the total ruin of their own country and therewith they exhorted the multitude to presen perfeur death before servitude end flavery. No man durst once open his mouth to contradict there to creat and mighty persons. At length a certain noble yong Gentleman, named also Theodotus, with whom the greater dread from the Romans abroad prevailed more, and overcame volt put themselves in liberty and shake off the yoke of their subjection, or else be surprised and thut within the compass of a small file and the strands of a barren foil, not able to nourish and maintain the inhabitants of to great and populous a City. Therefore with all speed they dispatched and sent forth their youth, and not on y forced the Caunians (not with standing they had joined unto them the aid of the Cybirats) to their obeisance, but also in battel neer Orthosia overcome, the Mylasseans and Alabandians; who having differzed the Euronensians of their province, ad-

City in the fault and folly of these "two persons? Certainly, I have often heard of men that for their countrey have willingly lost "their lives, but to think it meet, that their countrey should perish for them, these are the first "that ever were known. Why rather open we not our gates and submit our selves to that empire, "into which the whole world befides is subject. As he spake there words, the multitude followed him toward the gates: which when Antinous & The dotus iaw, they made no more ado, but brake upon the first corps de guard of the enemies which they came unto, and exposing their bodies to the fwords point, were foon killed, and the Town was yeelded into the hands of the Romans, Teamon also, upon the like wilfull obstinacy of Prince Cephalo, had shut their gates, but after that he was B flain, the Town was taken by furrender. And neither Phylace nor Horreum would abide the affault. Having thus quieted Epirus, and bestowed his forces by garrisons in diverse commodious Towns for the winter time, he returned into Illyricum: where he held a general affembly at Scodra, to which he had summoned the principal States of the whole nation, and whither also there were arrived five delegates from Rome, And there in this frequent and folemn fession, he pronounced from the Tribunal feat, by the advice of the counsel assistant unto him, That the Senate and people of Rome ordained the Illyrians to live free and enjoy liberty, and that himself would withdraw the garrisons out of their Towns, Fortresses and Castles. As for the Isleans, Taulantians, Tirustians in the Dassaretians countrey, Rhizonits and Olcianats (for that whiles Gentius his fortune stood upright, they had ranged with the Romans) he declared them not only free, but also exempt and pri-C viledged from all tributs. The Doarfians also, for leaving C. travantins, and passing with their armies to fide with the Romans, he endowed with the like immunity. They of Scodra, D. ffara, and Selepita, with the rest of the Illyrians, were to pay the one moity of the tribute which they had veelded to the King, After this he divided Illyricum into three cantons: the one of them he made of those before named: the second, all the Labeats: and the third, of the Agravonits Rhezonits, Olciniats, and those that bound and border upon them. Having let down this order in Illyricans he returned to Paffaroa City in Epirus, there to lie for the winter time.

Whiles these things hapned in Illyricum, Paulus before the coming of the ten Legats, sent Q. Maximus his fon (who was now lately returned from Rome) to the faccage of Eginum and Agassa. The quarrel against Agassa, was, for that they having delivered the Town on e to Martius n the Conful, and therwith of their own accord craved the alliance of the people of Rom; revoted notwithstanding afterwards to Perfess, As for the Æginians, they had committed a late and fresh tre pals: for giving no credit to the fame that was voiced of the Romans victory, they cruelly handled certain Roman souldiers, who were entred into their City. Moreover, he sent L. Post humius likewise to ransack in hostile manner the City of the Ænians, for that they had persisted in arms more stiffy than the other neighbour Cities, Now was it about that season of the year which men call Autumn : in the beginning whereof, so soon as he had determined to ride a circuit and visit all Greece round, and to see those places whereof there went so great a name, and which were more renowned by hear-fay than known by fight of eyeshe left C. Sulpitius Gallus for the command and guard of the camp, & let forward in his progress, accompanied with no great train. And being guar-E ded of the one hand with his own fon Scipio, and on the other, with Athenaus the brother of King Eumenes, he passed through Theffaly, toward the famous Oracle at Delphos. Where, after he had facrificed to Apollo, he destined and appointed those Columns & Pillars (which were begun in the porchiof that Temple, and wherupon the flatutes of King Perfins should have been erected forto fustain and bear the statues of himself with the title Victorious. He visited also the temples of f pa Tropbon in Lebadia: where after he had feen the mouth of that peakifh cave into which they vie to descend that would have the benefit of the Oracle, and know the will of the Godssalter acrifice also done to Jupiter and Herciana, whose temple there is to be seen he went down to Classia, to behold the frith of Euripus; and that Island which in times past was united & joined to the firm continent by a bridg. From Chalcis he croffed over to Aulis three miles distant from thence, a port spobled for the rode some time there of Agamemnoni fleet, consisting of a thousand sail, Being there, he went to the Temple of Diana, where that King of Kings (Agamemnon) offered his own there, ne went to the 1 empie of Diama, where that hing of hings of his fleet intending to fail to * Iphigenia. * daughter in facrifice upon her altar, to have a profesors voingefor his fleet intending to fail to * Iphigenia. Troy. After this, he came to Oropus, Town in Attica, where Amphilochus the Prophet is worthipped as a God, There, was to be feen an ancient Temple, most pleasant to behold for the goodly Fountains and Rivers round about it. Then went he forward to Athens a City likewile for antiquity of fame much spoken of, and highly renowned time out of mind: wherein were many monuments also worth the seeing a namely, the citadel, the havens, the walls that reach from the City to Pyraum, the affenals made by great Captains and Commanders, the images of the Gods and of menlikewife, forare & excellent, as well for the artificial workmanthip, as the matter wherof they g were made. When he had facrificed within the City to Minerva the goddels and patronels of the faid citadel he kept on his journey and the next day following arrived at Corinth, A fair & beautifull City this was in those daies, before it was destroied, the fortress there and the Isthmus were things of essectianmark and worth the fight: for the faid fortress not with standing it be mounted up to an exceeding height above all yet is it full of fountains; and the Ifthmus by a narrow ridge of and dividethewofess neer rogether, the one lying East, and the other West. From them e he went to Epidaurus, nothing in wealth comparable to the reft, yet of great name for the famous temple of A Sculapius, which flandeth 5 miles to from the City, where at this day are to be seen the marks and tokens of the empty places from whence the oblations have been plucked away : but then a rich place it was and full of those offrings and gifts, which diseased persons had consecrated to that God in recompence and reward for those soveraign salves and wholesom remedies which they there found, From thence he came to Lacedamon; a City memorable not for any magnificence of stately works and buildings, but for good discipline and orders there observed. From whence passing through Megalopolis, he ascended up to Olympia: where among other things there to be feen he beheld Jupiter as it were represented even before his eies, whereat he was much moved in spirit, And therfore as if he had been to facrifice in the capitol, he commanded a facrifice to be prepared with more flate and magnificence than ordinary. Thus having vifited all Greece over without any fearth and enquiry made, 7 how men either in general or particular stood affected in the war against Perfess, (because he would not trouble and disquiet the minds of the allies with any fearful occurrent) as he returned toward Demetrias, he was encountred by the way with a number of Ætolians all clad in doleful & mourning array. And when he wondred and asked what the matter might be, he was given to understand that 550 of their principal men of name, were by Lycifem and Tifippu massacred, who with the help of certain Roman fouldiers sent from Babim the Governor, had beset their Senat: that the rest were driven into exile; and the goods as well of those who were murdered, as also of the banished persons were now possessed by their accusers. He commanded them to attend upon himat Amphipplis, and when himself had communed & conferred at Demetrias with Cn. Oftavius, after he once heard that the ten legats had passed the seas, the laid aside all other affairs, and went & directly to Apollonia there to meet with them. To which placewhen Perfess came to meet him, for he having over-large liberty of poiton, was come from Amphipelis & that was a dates journey offiunto the K, he shewed good countenance and gave him good and gracious words, but after he was returned to the camp at Amphipelis, he frarply checked and rebuked, as mentay, C. Sulpitius, first for suffering Perseus to range so loosly and so far off from him, all over the province secondly, for giving his fouldiers so much liberty as to plack the titles from off the walls [and honses] of the City to cover the places of their winter harbour; and therewith he commanded that the tiles should be carried thither again where they had them, and the houses to be repaired as sufficiently as before. As for Perseus and his elder son Philip, he delivered unto A. Posthumius to be kept in fafe cull ody: but his daughter and yonger fon, he fent for to Amphipolis from Samothrace, and used them with all courtefy and kind intertainment as possibly he could. When the day was come, on which he appointed that ten principal burgeffes out of every City should repair to Amphipolis & that all the Kings letters and writings in what place foever to be found, should be fought up & represented there together with all his mony he sat him down upon the tribunal seat together with the ten legats from Rome, and the whole multitude of the Macedonians were gathered round about him, Albeit they had been used to subjection under the King, yet this new Tribunal carried with it a form and fliew of a terrible government, namely, when they faw the tipflaves & huishers to keep the doors and places of entry, the publick crief and the fergeant : firange matters all unto their eies and ears & whereto they had not been accustomed, able to firike a terror to allies much more then, to conquered enemies. After filence made by the crier, Paulus pronounced in the Latine M tongue, what the Senats pleasure was to be done, and what himself with the advice of his Councel affiliant about him had thought upon and fet down: all which points Cn.Ottavius the Pretor (for he also was in place) interpreted and related again in the Greek language. Imprimis, they ordained the Lacedamonians to be free, to have and enjoy the same Cities and territories, to use and exercile their own Laws to create yearly Magistrats, and to pay half of that tribute to the people of Rome, which they nied to pay unto their Kings, Item, to divide Macedony into 4 quarters; The one, and that the principal for to contain all the country between the 2 tivers Strymon and Neffu; to which part there should be laid the tract on the farther side of the river Nessus Eastward (where Perfeus held Towns, Caftles and Cities) excepting Anus, Maronea, and Abdera: allo beyond Strymon Wellward all the Bilaltique territory, together with Heraclea, which they call Syntice, For the N second, all those parts which on the East-fide the river Strymon eticloseth, except Syntice, Heralea, & the Bifaltes : also on the West, whatsoever is bounded with the river Axins, together with the Paonians lying to it, who inhabit upon the river Axius Eastward. The third quarter was that, which Axius from the east and Peneus the river from the west do compassion to the north-fide is limited with the mountain Bora, and to this portion was edjoined the tract of Paonia, which coasteth along the river Axias toward the west: Edeffaalso and Berrhaa were annexed therto. The fourth was beyond the mountain Bora; confining on the one fide upon Illyridum; & on the other upon Epirm. The head cities of every quarter where they should hold their sessiand councels he appointed thefe: For the first, Amphipolis; The falonica for the second; In the third Pellaik Pella gonia in the fourth. To these places he ordsined that by summons they should repair and hold the assemblies of each quarter; thither the mony to be brought; and there the magistrate to be created. Jem, he declared and pronounced that it should not be lawful for any person to contract mariage. neither to have commerce & trafficktogether in buying or felling of lands on tenements without the limits of their own division. Jiem, that in their mines they should no more dig for filter and gold: but for Iron and brafs they had permission, And those that had the profit therof, were topy the one half of the old rent, which they were wont to yeeld and grant unto the King dim he for Abad them to use any more forrain salt brought from out of other parts. When the Dardanians put in their claim for Paonia, for that it had sometime been their appurtenance, and also confined upon their country; he pronounced freedom to all those who had been subjects to K. Perfess. But afterwards, when they could not obtain Paonia, he granted unto them the commodity of the traffick for falt; and he charged the inhabitants of the faid country to cary it to Stobi in Paonio, and he fet them down a certain price. Item, he debarred them from felling any ship-timber themselves, and from suffering any others. Unto those countries which bordered upon the Barbarians and except the third quarter all the rest confined upon them) he granted that they might keep armed garrifons upon their frontiers and marches. These Acts and ordinances thus published the first day of the fession, wrought diversly in the minds of men, Freedom granted beyond their expectation, and n the easment in the yearly tribute, comforted their spirits and made them look up, But by the interruption of the commerce & traffick one region with another, they seemed like creatures dismembred and plucked afunder joint-meal, so as having need one of another, yet they had no mutual & reciprocal use and intercourse. In so much as the Macedonians themselves knew full little how big and large Macedony was, and how commodiously it was divided, so as each part was sufficient in it felf without the help of others. The first region containeth the Biralta who inhabit beyond the river Nefine and about Serymon, the most valiant men of all the rest : besides, it hath many proper commodities by it felf as well fruits of the earth as mines of metals, together with the opportunity and commodious fituation of Amphipolis, which as a frontier-bar ftoppeth all avenues on the eath side into Macedony. The second quarter hath in it two most samons and frequented cities, Thefra-Clonica and Cafsandria: & Pallene, a fertile & fruitful land. Besides, the maritime commodities which the havens at Torone and the head of Athos (and it they call the port or rode of Eneas) do yeeld; to say nothing of other bayes lying handsomely, some toward the Iland Euban, others toward Hellespont. The third countrey containeth thefamous cities Edefsa, Berrhaa and Pella; the warlike nation of the Veteil, and many Gauls and Illyrians besides who there inhabit, notable men all of action & execution. The fourth region is peopled with the Eordians, Linceftians, and Pelagonians: unto whom, the provinces Atintania, Stymphalis, and Eliminia are adjoyed. All this quarter is cold, rough and hardto dwell in. The nature of the inhabitants is likewise sutable to the soil & the fiercer they are by reason of the barbarous nations their neighbours, who one whole find them occupied with war, and other whiles mingle their rites and fashions with theirs in time of peace. DWhen Macedony was thus divided and each part diftinguished by their several uses & commodities, he appointed a general review to be made and enrolment of all the Macedonians; having declared unto them before, that he purposed to give laws unto them.

This done, the Ætolians were cited and called next; and in the whole course of the commission astouching them and their affairs, more inquisition there was, who savoured the Romans, and who affected the King than of any that either had done or fuffered wrong. The murderers were found unguilty and absolved and the banishment of the exiled was as much avowed as their death jultified who were massacred: A. Babins only was convicted and condemned, for that he had sent Roman fouldiers to execute the faid butchery. This issue of the Ætolians cause, pussed up the spirits of all those who had sided with the Romans, throughout all the nations and cities of Greece, Ein such fort as they grew to a pride intolerable : but contrarywise put down & abased under their feet, as many as were inspected any waies to have cast a favor and born good will to the King. The principal states-men of their cities were of three forts; two of them were skillful in the art of foothing, & either by submitting and subjecting under the Roman Empire, or winding within the favor and friendshipsof the KK grew infinitly rich and mighty themselves in privat, with the publick oppression and undoing of their countrey: the third between, sung a mean, and was cross to the other; men that flood for the defence of their liberties and maintenance of laws, who as they were more dearly beloved of their neighbours at home, fo they were less gracious and of credit with strangers abroad. The favorits and supposts only of the Romans, were advanced by their prosperitysthey alone far in place of government, they were employed in allemba flages, and none but they. F These being there present in great number coming out of Pelaponnesus, Baoria, and from other frequent affemblies of Greece, filled the heads of the ten delegats and high commissioners; buzzing into their ears, that not they alone who openly were seen in their bravery and vanity of spirit, vanting themselves for the hosts and friends of King Persens, but many more besides under hand took part with him and favoured his proceedings: as for the rest (under a colour of maintaining liberty) practifed in all their counsels and complotted against the Romans what they could: and never would the Greek Nations abide long in their allegeance, unless the hearts of that fide were taken down and broken; and their authority only cherished, confirmed, and strengthned, who regarded nothing else but the empire and soveraignty of the Romans. When these had informed and presented divers by name: sent for they were by the letters missive of the General, out of G Atolia, Acarnahia, Epirus, and Bastia, to give their attendance and follow him to Rome, there to answer the cause. But into Achea two of the high Commissioners were sent, namely, C. Classdun and Cn. Domitis, who personally should summon them by vertue of their edict. And this was done for two confiderations; the one, because they thought verily that the Acharans were more confident and couragious, and therefore would not obey the fummons by letters, and peradventure alfo. Callier ates and other the informers and accusers who made presentment of their names, should be in some danger of their lives; the other cause why they would be present to give them summons was this, that amongst the Kings records and rols they had sound the letters of the principal Stateimen of other nations; but of the Achaens there appeared no writing at all under their hands, and therefore the imputations charged upon them, were nothing evident.

After the Ætolians were dismissed, the nation of the Acarnanians was cited and called into place: as for them, there was no change nor alteration; only Leneas was exempt from doing fervice to the high court and general affembly of the Acarnanians. As they followed the inquilition fill farther and farther, making enquiry who either in publick or private had taken part with the King, they extended their commission as far as into Asia; and sent Laboo to demolish and race Autiffaa City in the Isle Lesbos, and to translate the inhabitants thereof to Methymna: the pretence was for that they had given harbor in their haven to the provisions of Antenor the Kings Admiral, at what time as he hovered and ranged about Lesbos with his pinnaces. Two there were that I loft their heads,men of quality and great worth, to wit, Andronics the Ætolian, fon of Andronicm, for that he followed his father and bare arms against the people of Rome; and Neona Theban, by whose advice and perswasion they had contracted a society with Perseus.

After this enquelt of forrain causes interposed and coming between the assembly of the Macedonians was called again; wherein as touching the flate of Macedony, pronounced and published it was, That there should be certain Senators chosen, whom they call Synedri, by whose counsel the common-weal should be managed and governed, After this, were the names read of the principal Macedonians, whom he appointed (together with their children as many as were above fifteen years of age) to go before into Italy. This at first was thought to be an hard and cruel course, but anon it appeared to the multitude of the Macedonians that it was all done for their liberty. For K nominated there were, the Kirgs friends and gallants of his court, the commanders of armies, the Admirals of the fleets, and the Captains of the garrifons, who were wont to ferve the King bafely, but to over-rule others proudly and imperioufly : some exceeding rich and wealthy, others spending above the proportion of their revenues and living : all faring at their table, and arraied in apparel like KK. not one carying with him the civil mind of a good citizen, not one that could abide to hear of laws, or of equal liberty. Al these therfore, who had been employed in any ministry or service about the King, even they also who had been used in the least embassages that were had commandment to depart out of Macedony and to go into Italy: and look who obeyed not this edict, were threatned with death. Unto Macedony he gave laws, with fuch diligent care and good regard, as if he had reckoned them not for enemies vanquished, but for allies of good desert: such ; laws (I fay) as the very practife and tryal of long time (the only corrector of all statutes) was not able upon that experience, to check and control

After these serious affairs were finished, he exhibited with great furniture and preparation, a folemnity of game and disport at Amphipalis, which long before he had intended, and for the intimation wherofhe had both fent out his meffengers to the States of Afia and to the KK, and also himself in his circuit and visitation of the Grecian Cities, had given warning to the great men and principal citizens. And thither repaired out of all parts of the world, a number of cunning, dextrous, and artificial actors, that made profession of such plaies and passimes; besides a fort of wreftlers, champions, and brave horses of the best kind & breed. Also divers embassages with their bealts for facrifices, and what soever else was usually done of custome, at the great and solemn ga-M mings in Greece. Thus it came to pals, that men admired not only his magnificence, but his wifedome also in exhibiting their shews and fights, wherin the Romans at that time were altogether rude and ignorant. Moreover, he feasted and banketted the Embass, in the same sumptuous manner and respective consideration. And this (by report) was an apophthegm and common saying of his, That none could make feafts and fet forth plaies better than he who had the skill to win a field Having represented these solemnities of all forts, and bestowed all the brasen shields on shipboords all other armor and weapons of fundry kinds, he piled upon a mighty heap, and after his praiers made to Mars, Minerva, dame Lua, and other Gods and Goddesses, unto whom of right and duty appertained to confecrate and dedicate the spoils of enemies; himself the General with his own hands put under a burning torch, and kindled the fire, and after him all the marshal-colonels stan- N ding round about, cast every man his fire-brand, and set all a burning. This was a thing noted in that great assembly of Europe & Asia, where there was such a confluence of people from all parts, as well to testify their joy in his behalf as to see the shews and disports: in that meeting, I say, of so great armies of sea-servitors and land-souldiers, there was that plenty of all things and cheapness of victuals, that Emplius the General, of that exceeding flore and abundance, gave much away freely to privat persons, to cities and nations, not only for their present use, but also to cary home with them into their countries. And this multitude there affembled took nos more pleasure either in beholding the stage-plaies acted, or seeing men practise seats of bodily strength and activity, or the running of horses in the race, as in viewing the Macedonian booty and pillage laid all abroad to be feen ; namely, of Statues, and painted tables, of rich cloth of tiffue, of veffels in gold, in fil-O ver, in copper, and ivory, most curiously wrought in that roial seat and City of Pella, not only to fervoior a present shew and no more slike those that the Kings Palace of * Alexandria was replenished with) but also for continual and everlassing use. These were all embarked, and committed to the charge of Cn. Off avius to be transported to Rome. Paulus after he had given the Embaffadors a gracious and courteous farewel, passed over the River Strymon, and lodged within a mile of Amphipolis. From thence he dislodged and journeyed until he came on the fifth day as far as

APella. And passing by the City, he abode two daies at a place which they call Spelanm, and then helent P. Nafica, and Q. Maximus his own fon with part of the forces in ar expedition, to give the wast unto those Illgrians, who had succoured Perfem in his wars, but he commanded them to meet him at Orienm. Himself marching toward Epirin, at the fifteenth remove arrived at Paffaron. Not far from thence lay Anicion encamped : unto whom he dispatched his letters, to the end that he should not be troubled at those designs which were to be put in execution signifying therein, that the Senat granted to the army the pillage of all the Cities of Epirm, which had revolted unto Perfesse: which done, he suborned certain Centurions, and sent them into all the Towns with instructions, to give out that his coming was to withdraw all the garrisons from thence, with an intent that the Epirots should enjoy their freedom as well as the Macedonians; B & fo he summoned out of every City ten of the chief to repair unto him. And when he had charged & commanded them to bring abroad into the market place all the gold and filver which they had he sent out certain cohoits and companies of souldiers to every of the faid Cities: they who were affigned for the places farther remote went before them which were appointed to the neerer; and this was ordered fo, that upon the same day they should enter into them all at once, North the Colonels and Centurions had their errand delivered them what to do. In the morning betimes all the gold and filver was brought forth together accordingly, and that at the fourth hour of the day a fignal was given to the fouldiers to fall to ranfack and rifle the Cities, Wherein they found so great flore of pillage, that every horiman had for his part * 400 Denarii, and the footinen * 1246, 10 ft. 200 apiece, and a hundred and fifty thousand pols were led away into captivity. Then the walls flote C were rased of the said Cities thus spoiled, and those were to the number of seventy. All the boots and prizes were fold, and out of that mass of money were the fouldiers paid. From thence Paulus went down to the Sea fide, unto Oricem. But the fouldiers minds were nothing fo well fatisfied, as he supposed they had been, for discontented mightily they were and angry, that they had no share at all in the Kings pillage and treasure, as if they had made no war in Macedony. At Oricum he found those forces which he had fent under the conduct of S. Nasica and Maximus his son; there he shipped his whole army, and sailed over into Italy, In like manner a few daies after, Anicius, when the seffion and general meeting of the other Epirots and Acarnanians was ended, having given commandment, that the inprincipal perions should follow him into Italy (the knowledge and deciding of whose causes he reserved and reserved thither) himself attended the ships D which the army had used in Macedony, and passed over likewise into Italy.

At what time as these affairs were thus managed in Macedony and Epirus, the Embassadors who had been sent with Attalus to end the war between the Gauls and King Eumenes, attived in Afia. A furcease of arms for the winter time, was agreed upon between both parties, during which celfation the Gauls departed home, and Eumenes was retir d to Pergannus there to winter, where also he lay grievously fick. The spring was no sooner come, but the Ganls began to stir and look as broad: but by that time they were come as far as the Synada, Eumenes had affembled his forces from all parts to Sardis: There are Synada, the Romans parled with Solovitius the Gener I of the Gauls; Andus also went with them : but thought good it was not, that he should enter within the Gauls camp, for fear of flirring coals in heat of argument, and raising choler of the one side or E other, So P. Licinius communed with the Duke of the Gauls aforfaid: and when he had done he brought word back, that the more he was entreated, the worse he was and less tractable ; insomuch as it might feem a wonder, that the words of the Roman Embassadors were so powerful and effectual with Antiochus and Ptolomeus (two mighty and puissant Kings) as to make peace so presently between them, since they prevailed so little or nothing at all among the Gauls."

To return again to Rome. First, the two captive Kings, Perfeus and Gentius were sent thither, and committed there to ward they and their children : after them; the multitude befides of priloners, then consequently those Macedonians, as also the other chief peers of Greece, who were warned to repair unto Rome. For not they only were summoned to make apparence there, who had been feen present in place, but also all those were sent for by letters millive peremptorily, who were but reported to have been with the Kings. Then Parlus him eif a few dates after embatked in a ship of the Kings, a Galeace of a mighty bigness, making way with fixteen banks and rowes of oars to a fide, and the same set out and adorned with the Macedonian spoils, not only of brave gorgeous armour, but also of rich hangings, tiffue & cloth of gold out of the Kings wardrobe, came up the Tyber against the stream: where great numbers of people went forth to meet him, and filled the banks on both fides of the river. Some few daies after Anicius and Octavius artived also with their fleet. And to all three, by an act of the Senat was triumph granted. Q. Caffius the Pretor had commandment to deal with the Tribunes of the Commons by warrant from the Senat, that they should prefer a bill unto the common people, that those three should be in su I commission of command and government that day when they were to ride triumphant into the City. See, how-Gmean things escape the touch of envy, but the highest commonly are met with. No doubt was made at all of the triumph of Anicins, nor yet of Octavius. But Paulius, with whom even they themfelves would have been abashed to compare, could not avoid the backbiting of slanderous & malicioustongues. His fouldiers according to the ancient discipline of war, he had held hard to their fervice, And to them had he given a donative indeed out of the booty, but more niggardly & with alighter hand than they hoped for from out of so great wealth and riches of the Kings: and yet in good faith to fay a truth, full well he knew that if he had fatisfied their greedy denre, and dealet fill amongst them til they had cried Ho, he should have left himself jud nothing to have brought H into the commontreasury, So that all this Macedonian army gave a shew by this time, as if they had but cold devotion to their General, either to appear, or to give their voices for the setting forward of the bill aforefaid, as touching his triumph and plenary power of command, when the day of affembly shouldcome. Over and besides, Ser. Sulpitim Galba, who had been a martial Colonel in the second legion, in Macedon, and in privat enmity with the General; both himself in perfon was in hand with him, and by the fouldiers also of his own legion follicited and spurred on the rest to appear in sufficient number, there for to give their suffrages against him, and check the bill: faying, "That as he was an imperious and Lordly commander, fo he was as milerable a pincher peny withal, and a good deed it were to deny his grace and to cross the law proposed for his "triumph, & foto be revenged of him throughly : for no doubt the commons of the City would I "go that way that they should see the souldiers to lead before. He could not for soth (lay they) " give money among his fouldiers liberally . well, he hall furely know, that his fouldiers yet can " give him honour; but never let him look for the fruit of favor and grace, where he hath deler-"ved none. These words set them agog; and when Tiby Sempronius a Tribune of the Commons read out and published the sorelaid bill in the Capitol, Ind that by permission of law any private perion might have spoken thereto, and no man came forth, as being a matter whereof no doubt & question was to be made : then Servim Galba suddainly stept forth, and required of the Tribune, That (forasmuch as it was so far forth dayes, as being the eight hour thereof, so that he had not time enough to declare and shew at large, what allegations he had why they should not grant L. Amilius a triumph) they would adjourn the affembly to the next day, and betimes in the morning set the matter on soot again; for that he had need of a whole day and no less, to plead that cause to the full as he should do. But when the Tribune willed him again to speak his mind that day, if he had ought to fay; he made a speech, and with his long oration held the court until it was within night: putting them in mind and alledging, "How precifely and rigoroully he had exacted at their hands all military duties; how he had imposed upon the souldiers more painful " and dangerous labour than need was: but contrary-wife in dealing rewards and bestowing ho-" nourable recompences for good service, he was over-straight-laced & too short inevery point and verily fouldiery and warfare, it it continued fill under fuch Captains, will be more hard tra-" veliome and rough to fouldiers and warriors : but when all is done and victory obtained, rewar-"ded it shall be with bare poverty and neglect of honour. Certainly, the Macedonians are in bet-" ter case yet than the Roman souldiers. But if they would be present in great frequency the next "morrow for to deny and revoke this bill, then these rich and mighty men shall know full well, "That all lieth not in the hands of the Captain and Commander, but that the fouldiers also cando fomwhat. The fouldiers animated and induced with these perilous words, resorted the day following in lo great multitudes and peftered the whole Capitol fo full, as none but they could come in to give their voice. The first tribes that were called in, clearly casted the grace which when the principal and chief men of the City faw, they ran all into the Capit of with open mouth crying out upon this indignity offered, That L. Paulus a conqueror in so great and dangerous a war, should be deprived of his due triumph; and the grand Commanders and Generals of the field were now subjected and enthralled to the loose licentionsness and greedy avarice of their souldiers. In this one thing (lay they) have we too too much faulted, such hath been our favour and partiality, and M fo loth have we been to displease any: but what will become of us in the end if souldiers once may come to be Lords and masters, and thus to crow over their Generals? And every man railed and cried out upon Galba. In the endafter this garboil was appealed, M. Servilius who sometime had been Conful and great master of the horse under the Dictator, requested the tribunes that they would begin all again anniling that which was past and give him leave withal to make a speech beforethe people. The Tribuns went afide to consult of this matter; and in fine, over-ruled with the authority and countenance of the nobles and peers of the City, began to treat afresh and go in hand with all matters ane w, making it known openly that they would recal back those first tribes; in case M. Servilim and other privat men who were willing to utter their mind to the cause had N once poken. Then iaid Servilius as followeth, "Masters and triends citizens here of Rome if and M. Servilles "by nothing else it might be judged, how fingular & how excellent a Commander L. Emilia was in the behalt "in the field, this only (if there were no more) may fuffice, that having in his camp such feditions "and light headed persons for his souldiers, and an adversary of his own among them so noble of " birth, fo rash of action, and withalso arrogant and self-conceited, ready to incite and six upa "multitude to commotion, yet troubled he never was with any mutiny at all in his whole army. "The same severity it was in government & conduct, that held them in aw and good order, which "now at this present they hate & detest. And so long as they were managed by ancient discipline, " they durft not quetch nor give offence. As for Sergim Galba if (like a new barrifter who isto "Thew the first proof, & to give the assay and hansel of his eloquence) he would have made choice cot L. Paulus to begin withal and accuse him at the bar, he should not yet have hindred his tri "umph, which (if there were nothing else to disswade and draw him back) the Senathad judged to be just & due: but the morrow after his triumph (when he had seen him a privat managain) he might have given presentment of his name, & by order of law ministed interrogatories unto "him and loentred process: or rather he might have flaid a little longer, namely, until himfelf had been a Magiltrat in place, and then have gone roundly to work, arefled him upon an action

A . to answer at aday, and so accused him judicially before the people. Thus should L. Emplius have " had his triumph for reward and recompence of his well-doing, in that so nobly & valiantly he , had conducted this war: thus like wife should he have suffered condign punishment, if he had " committed ought unworthy either of his ancient glory or this new honor, But will you have the " truth? when he could find no matter of crime to reproach him with he fought by-waies and in-"direct means to detract his well deserved praises, He demanded yesterday, one full day to accuse "L. Paulus : and tour hours, even all the day time that was left he spent in making an investive * By this is to against him. What prisoner was there ever brought to the bar so culpable and sintul, but all the be colleded, faults of his whole life might be ripped up, deciphered, and painted forth in fo many hours space? that they But what objected he all that while, that L. Paulus if he were to frame his defence, would will counted the B, to deny? O that some man would procure me here for the while; two assemblies and confts, the day 12 hours, from 6 to 6, 60 one of Roman fondiers emploied lately in Macedon; the other more pure and uncorrupt of the not from a roe. twain namely, of citizens founder in judgment, void of all favor, & cleer from hatred. And the to fun as fonce people of Rome I would have to be the judg. First, let Paulus be accused in the grand assembly & would have it court of these citizens. Tell me O S. Galba, what would you say against him before those Quirits of Rome, For there you should have been cut off and lost all this discourse & special part of your oration, carying these terms, You looked too streightly & precisely to the corps de guard in their stations; you held the fouldiers too hard to their watch and ward; the sentinels were neerly and "narrowly looked unto; & you were over curious about going the rounds & relieving the watch " in the night leafon; about the works and fabricks you put the fouldiers to more toiling & moil-Co ing than heretofore; whiles you, my L. General, their furveior, over-leer, and task-maker, rode " all about to exact the utmost with all extremity; in one & the same day when you had the army on foot, presently from a journy you led them forth to battail; when the victory was got, you " would not fuffer the fouldier to breath and take repose, but caused him to march immediatly & e to follow the enemy in chale; also, wheras the booty to be parted & shared out might have ena riched your felf, yet will you carry the Kings treasure in shew of triumph & then lay it up in the " chamber of the City. As these be shrewd matters, like sharp goads to prick those souldiers & set " them on who think they have not loope enough to serve their dissolut loones or too small al-" lowance to content their coverous appetits : fo, with the people of Rome they would have no-" thing at all prevailed: who if they should not call to mind examples & stories of old, which they na have heard their fatherstalk of mamely, what overthrows have been received through the indula gence and popularity of Generals; and contrary wife what victories have been atchieved by their " levere discipline and government: yet at least wife they cannot chuse but remember what ods & a difference there was in the late Punick war, between M. Minutius General of the horse, and Q. " Fabius Mar. his Dictator. And therfore fince the accuser might know all this, the defence of Paua lui in this behalf, was altogether needless and unnecessary. Let us go now to the other audience " and affembly of the Macedonian fouldiers. But now me thinks I must not cal you Quirites any " more but fouldiers: if haply there be so much grace in you, as that this name yet may cause you " to blufh & be abashed for very shame of the world to offer abuse unto your Genera. And veri-" ly for mine own part, I find a great change in my felf, & am otherwise affected in my mind, now E, that I feet to speak unto an army of souldiers, than ere-whiles I was, when my Oration was acaccommodate and framed to the commons of a City, Now fouldiers, what fay you to the matter? .. Is there any one at Romef but Perfeus again I that would not have a triumph over the Macedoniansi are you not ready to pull such a one in pieces with those very hands, wher with you vanquished the Macedonians? He, who soever he is, that impeacheth you for entring into the City in triumph, trust me truly, would have debarred you of victory, if it had bin in his power. Lo, how fouly are ye deceived (fouldiers) and far out of the way, if ye think that the triumph is the honor. only of the General, and not of the fouldiers likewife, and confequently of the whole people of Rome: This is not Paulus his case alone. Many others likewise there have been, who when they could not obtain triumph at the hands of the Senate, triumphed nevertheless upon the Albane mountain. As impossible it is for any man to bereave L. Paulas of the honor due for the finishing of the Macedonian war, as it was to disappoint C. Lust atius of his glory for ending the first Punick war, P. Cornelius for the second; or others besides who after them triumphed. It is not a triumph that can make L. Paulus better or worfe, either the greater captain or the less. Herein confifteth the credit, renown & reputation of the fouldiers and of all the people of Rome more than his: for fear left they be reputed & noted either for envious & malicious or else unthankful for their best members & noblest citizens: & therin seem to imitate the people of Athens, who evermore perfecute and plague with envy their best men that live amongst them. Your ancestors and forefathers when time was (faulted this waies enough I wis) in the perion of Camillus, whom they offred abuse unto before the City by his means was recovered out of the Gauls hands. Much you were to blame your selves here & overmuch too in P. Africanus. That in Liternum, his mansion house and place of habitation (who was the conqueror of Africk) should be shewed : that in Liternum (i fay) the sepulchre of P. Africanus should be seen, Let us blush for very shame, that L.Paulus, as he is equal to them in glory and honor, should likewife go with them and have his part of your hard and wrongful dealing. The first thing that ye do then, let be this: Out with this por & stain ofinfamy which ye have caughtiso reproachful in regard of other nations so hurt-A full to your selves, For who wil ever hereaster wish to be like Africanus? who will endeavor to refemble L. Paulus, in a City fo unthankful, nay fo spiteful and malicious to all good men? Say H there were no question at all of infamy and obloquy, but of horior only and reputation, tell me (1 beleech you) is there any triumph that compriseth not the glory also of the Roman name So e many triumphs over the Gauls, to many again over the Spaniards, and to many over the Canhasignians, are they reputed and called the triumphs of the Captains alone, and not likewise of the se people of Rome? And like as we say, that we triumplied not over Pyrrhm only, nor over Annis bal, but over the Epirois likewise and the Carthaginians: even so neither M. Curim alone, nor 6. P. Cornelius, but the Romans also have triumphed. True it is, and I must needs say, that the soula diers have a proper interest and part by themselves, in that they slone (dight with branches and chaplets of lanel, and every one bravely to be seen and adorded with the gifts that have been (given them) resound Io Triumphe, Io Triumphe, and as they pass along the City sing and chant the r or prailes of themselves and of their Captain Generals. And if it fortune at any time that the souldiers be not brought home out of the province to the triumph, they grumble & are discontentedise yet notwithstanding, absent though they be, they think it is their due; and folong as their General and leader triumpheth, they triumph alio, because the victory was atchieved by the , firength of their arms, Good fouldiers, it a man should ask you, for what intent you were reconducted into Italy and wherfore fo loon as the service was performed and the war brought to an end, ye had not prefently your congy of discharge? moreover to what purpose ye came by companies and iquadrons under your enligns and colors for what cause ye stay and remain here and go not every man his waies to his own home? what answer would ye make elfe, but, That ye would be seen in triumph? And to say a truth since ye have won the victory and are conquerots, I cannot blame you nay, ye ought to desire for to be seen and seen again. It is not long since we trinmphed over Philip (this mansfather) and over Antiochus likewife: and reigned both they did as KK, when the triumph was: and shall there be no solemnity of triumph over Perseus taken prisoner and brought captive with his children into the City? If L. Paulus, standing beneath as a privat perion (one among it the company of gowned citizens) feeing L. Anicius and CnOllawas arraied sumptiously in cloth of gold, and in their rich purple robes and mantles of estate, mounting up the Capitol in their triumphant chariots, should ask them the question and lavin this manner: Te I me, O Lucius Anicius and you Cn, Octavius, judg ye in your own conceit that you are more worthy of a triumph than I? They would no doubt come down each one out of his chariot and yeeld him their place, yea, and for very shame deliver up all their enfigns and or naments unto him, And you Quirites, had you rather see Genius than Perseus led intriumph? would you wish indeed to triumph for an accidental appendant only of the war, rather thanfor the main substance of the war. Shall the legions coming out of Sclavonia, and the mariners at sea, enter the City crowned with laurel garlands; and the legions out of Macedons, being denied their own triumph fland flill and behold others to triumph? Moreover, what shall become of that rich booty? what shall be done with the spoils of that great and wealthy victory? where shall be best owed and laid up so many thousand corflets and armors plucked from the bodies of enemics flain: Shall they be tent back again into Macedony? Those costly images of gold, of mar-"ble, of ivory; those goodly fair pictures; those pretious clothes and hangings of purple, scarlet, and tidine; that mighty quantity of gold and filver wrought into veffels chaled and engraven; that "huge mass of the Kings mony and coin, what shall we do with it? What? shall it be carried all by "night as floin goods into the publick treasury and City Chamber? The goodliest fight of all the "refl, what fay you to it? A most noble & puissant King is taken prisoner; where shall he be shewed "to the people of Rome his conqueror? What running, what concourse there was of people to see "K. Siphar captive (& yet he was but an acceffory to the Punick war) most of us do well remem-"her, Shall & Perfers then, a priloner and captive; shall Philip and Alexander his sons, (persons of fogreat name) be hidden and kept from the fight and eyes of the City? And there were no more but L. Emplus himfelf, twice Conful the conqueror & inbduer of Greece, all men would defire "to fee him enter the City in Lis triumphant chariot. We created him Cof, for this intent that he " should finish and determinthis war, which to your dishonor and great shame had hung for the N space of 4 years. To him then who (at what time as the lot of that province fell unto him and "when he departed on his voiage from Rome) had all our hearts to prelage victory and triumph, " shall we now deny triumph when he hath the victory? And verily in so doing, we shall not only " defraud men but rob the gods also of their honor; for due it is to the very gods also and not to " menalone. Have not your ancellors ever uled to enterprise all great affairs in the name of the "gods first & therin also to end last? The Col, or Pretor, when he is to take his journy into his proevince or to levy war, with his Lictors before him clad in their coats of arms is ever wont to make "his folemn vows in the Capitol: after he hath acquit himself of his charge and obtained victory. "when as he triumpheth he transferreth in pomp the rich presents of the people of Rome lo well deferved and offereth them to the tame gods in the faid apitol, unto whom there first hepro-nounced his vows. And the beasts for facilities going before the pomp of triumphare not the least " part of this folemnity that it may appear how the General in his return is mindful of the gods, & rendreth thanks unto them for the happy managing of the affairs of Commonweal, As for those bealls for facrifice which he hath appointed to be shewed in the pomp of triumph, flay them; e neither makes it matter whose hand doth it some kil one & some another, but those facred viands "of the Senat, which are not to be eaten in any privat house, nor in publick place unhallowed,

A "bus only in the Capitol; and there, not for the pleasure of men, but of Gods and men together. will ye trouble and impeach at the suggestion of Servine Galba? Shall the gates be shut against "the triumph of L. Paulus? shall Perfess King of the Macedonians, with his children and the multiende befides of captives, with the spoils of the Macedonians, be left behind at the river fide ? " shall L. Paulus go directly from the City gate home to his house as a privat person, like one that " hath been abroad in the countrey to fee his farm and is newly returned? But thou Centurion and "thou fouldier, give ear, I advise thee, to the ordinance which the Senat hath decreed as touching "the General Paulus, rather than to the vain speech of Serv. Galba: hearken to this that I say the "word rather than he. As for him, he hath learned nought elfe but to prate and talk and that to " the depraving of others full maliciously. Valering Antias reporteth, That the fum of all the gold and filver taken in pillage and carried in [] is supplied D the pomp of this triumph, amounted to the worth of 120 millions of Setiences. Which mass, no out of Plutarth, Somedoubt, arifeth much greater by the proportion of the number of wains, and the poiles both of what wanteth gold and filver by the same author set down in general sums. And as some have recorded the either besides immefrent in the war next before, or eliescattered and lost in his flight when he made halt to Samo- diatly offer thrace, as much again as that came to. And the more wonder it was, that so mighty a mais of this Oration, money had been gathered and heaped up within thirty years after the war between Philip and the of the deficion Romans, raised part out of the issue and incomb of his metal mines, and part out of other profits tion of Paulus and tributs. Thus Philip very bare of money, and Perfess contrary-wife exceeding rich, began to his tribungh, make war with the Romans. Last of all, Paulus himself rode in his chariot, carrying a great port and majefly with him both for his comely and personable body, and also for his reverent old age. After his charlor, among other honorable personages rode his two sons, Q. Maximus and P. Scipio. Thenfollowed the horsemen by troops, and the footmen by their cohorts and companies, every one keeping their ranks full decently. The footmen had given them a hundred Sefterces speece, the Centurions double, and the horsemen triple so much. And it is thought, that he meant to have given the footmen asmuch as the most, and to the rest in proportion, in case they either had not denied his honour by their voices, or if in token of thankfulness and joy, they had but. willingly and cheerfully shouted, when this sum which they received was pronounced and related unto them. And not Perfess alone (led as he was through the enemies City in chains before the triumphant chariot of the conqueror) but also Paulus himself the conqueror glittering to glorionfly in his cloth of gold and coffly purple, was a mirror to the word in those few daies, of the transi-Ftory and mutable state of mans life. For of those two sons, whom (after he had given the other two by way of adoption from himself) he kept alone at home as heirs to bear his name to maintain the facted rites and factifices of his family, and to uphold the house it self, the vonger a stripling under twelve years of age, five daies before his triumph died, and the elder full fourteen years old and more, departed within three daies after the triumph, Which two youth indeed ought to have been arraied in their embrodered robes of purple, and so to have ridden in the charior with their father, predestining and aiming to themselves the like triumphs another day.

Some few daies after, M. Antonim a Tribune of the Commons affembled a folemn audience of the people for his fake, wherein when after the manner and custome of other Generals he should discourse of his own exploits and worthy acts, he made unto them a memorable Oration and well beforming a noble Roman Prince, to his effect. "Albeit I suppose (quoth he) my neighbors The Oration and friends, the citizens of this noble City, you be not ignorant, both how happily I have ad- of L. Empliya "ministred the weal-publick and also how unfortunatly within these few daies two thunderbolts to the people "have shaken my private house, as having one while beheld the goodly shew and pomp of Rame, "triumph restifying the one, and seen another while the wofull sunerals and obsequies of my two "fone declaring the other; yet Ibeleech you fuffer me with that finglenels of heart and affection, " as lought, to make a brief comparison between mine own particular private sortune, and the Pppp

" publick felicity of the City, At my departure from Italy, Iloofed from Brundusium, and set up failH at the sun-rising: by the ninth hour of the same day I arrived safe with all my ships at Corphu "The fifth day after I came to Delphi, where I facrificed unto Apollo, for my felf, for your armies ce and your navy. From Delphi I departed, and within five daies was in the leaguer. Where, after

"I had received the charge of the army, and altered some things which might greatly have him-"dered the victory, I marched forward, for that the enemies camp was inexpugnable, and the King could not be forced by any means to fight: and piercing through his guards that kept the ce paffage, I went as far as Petra: fo as by this means having periorce drawn the King to fight, I "vanquished him in plain field and ranged battel. Macedony I subdued, and brought it in subje-& Clion to the people of Rome. Finally, that war which for four years together other Confuls be-6. fore me to managed, as each one left it ever to his successor worse than he found it, latchieved T es and brought to a final end in fifteen daies. I followed then in this train other prosperous affairs, as the fruits enfuing of that victory. For all the Cities of Macedony yeelded unto me, The Kings "treasure I seized upon: the King in person (as if the very Gods themselves had delivered and of put him into my hands I took priloner, with his fons in the Temple of the Samothracians, But then my heart milgave me, and even then I suspected the surpassing favour of my good fortune: "then calt I doubts, and began to fear the dangers at fea, having so mighty a mals of the kings " treasure to tran port, and my victorious army to reconduct back into Italy. But seeing all things 6. fall out to hearts defire, a prosperous voiage, a safe arival and whatsoever I could pray for at the "Gods hands; this I wished in my heart, (as knowing full well the wonted manner of fortune, e: when the is at the highest pitch, to turn back again and come as fast down) that mine own k "house, rather than the Common-weal, might feel that change and alteration whensoever it crame. And therefore I hope that this io notable a calamity of mine own, shall excuse the City · for having any other misfortune, fince that my triumph (as it were to check and mock the changes of this world) hath faln fo just between the funerals of my two fons. See how I and " Perfeus are represented above all others for two notable examples of the frail and unstable con-"dition of man. Lo how he, who being a prisoner himself, saw his sons likewiseled captives before 6: his face, hath them yet living found and fafe: and I, who have triumphed over him, came from "the burial of one of my fons to ride in my chariot up to the Capitol, and from thence descenedded again to find the other lying at point of death: neither is there of all that fair issue that I " had, one left to bear the name of L. Paulus Amylius. For two of them the house of the Cornelii L e and the Fabii have, unto whom I gave them in adoption, as out of a great race and breed of st children: 10 as now, in the family of Paulus there is not one left but himself. Howbeit for this cocalamity and tuin of my house, your felicity and the happy estate of the City is a great comfort and confolation again. These words delivered with such a magnanimity, troubled the spirits of the auditors, and attonied them more, than if he had lamentably moned himself unto them with pitcous tears, for his childless estate and desolat condition. C.Octav. us tolemnized his naval triumph over King Perseus the first day of December: in which folemnity, he neither had pritoners led in shew, nor spoils carried in pomp. He gave to his mariners and failers feventy and five Denarii apeece; to every pilot double, and to the ship-masters four times as much. After this, the Senat affembled, and the LL, ordained, That Q. Caffins should M lead King Perfeus with his fon Alexander, together with his train that accompanied him, as also, bring all his money and goods, filver, or what moveables and furniture soever he had to Alba, thereto be kept in sure custody. But the Kipgs son of Thrace, with the hostages was sent to Carfeoli, there to lie in fafe ward. As for the rest of the captives who had been led in triumph, thought good it was they should be clapt up fast in prison, it is

Some few dayes after their things, there arrived Embaffadors from Corys King of the Thracians, bringing with them money for the rantome of his ton and the other hoftages. Into the Senat they were brought; where, by way of preamble they laid this for the ground of their speech, That Corps had not fided with King Perfeus in the war, upon his own motive and accord, but was compelled to give hoftages: then they befought the LL, of the Senate to inffer them to be redeemed at N what price foever they would let down, were it never fo high. Unto whom this answer was returned by authority of the Senat, "That the people of Rome bare well in mind the amity which "they had with Corys, with his progenitors, and the whole nation of the Thracians. As for the egiving of the hollages, it was rather an evidence to prove, than an argument to excule their ef trespass and fault : considering that when Perseus was quiet, the Thracian nation stood inno fear and aw of him, much leffe then, when as he was troubled and occupied in war with the Ro-"mans. Howbeit although Cotys preferred the favour of Perfeus before the friendship of the peoee ple of Rome, yet they would confider of the matter, and respect more his quality and what was meet for his estate, than his detert and what he was worthy to have and therefore they would " release his son and the hostages, and send them home again. As for the people of Rome, their man-Q " ner is to bellow their favours and benefits freely without regard of recompence: the worth and " estimation whereof they had rather leave to the consideration and minds of the receivers, than "require and demand the same presently. So there were Embassadours nominated to reconduct the hostages into Thrace, to wit, T. Quintius Flaminius, C. Licinius Nerva, and M. Caninius Rebilus. And to those Thracian Embassadours were given by way of presents 2000 asses apeece. So. Bitis with the rest of the hostages was sent for from Carfeoli, and with the fore-named Embassadors reeurned again to his father.

The five and fortieth Book of T. Livius.

A The Kings ships taken from the Macedonians, of an extraordinary and monstrous bignes bestire sime were landed upon Mars field and there laid up drie. Whiles the late remembrance of the Macedonian triumph remained still not in the minds only, but as it were in the very eyes of men, L. Anicius triumphed overKing Gentius and the Illyrians upon the very day of the feath " Quirinhlia. It was generally thought that all things therein rather refembled some likenes in shew, then the sooiled the otherwise countervailed in substance the former triumph. The General himself Anicins was infederally, and known rior to Emplim both in nobility and also in quality of person: and setting together their places upon the 18 of command, the one being but Pretor, and the other Conful; neither was Gentum equal to Per- Fibrust, few, nor the Illyrians to the Macedonians. Spoil for spoil, money for money gifts for gifts there was no proportion nor comparison between them. And therefore as that itelly late triumph was B more resplendent and glorious than this, so considered in it self without other respect it was not to be found fault withal and despised. Anicius within few daies had vanquished and throughly tamed the nation of the Illyrians; both by Sea and Land proud and mighty; bearing themselves Hour and bold for their firong and fenced forts. The King he took prisoner and those of the Kings race and roial blood. He shewed in triumph many field-enfigns, besides other spoils and moveablelgoods of the King. Likewife of gold leven and twenty pound weight, and of filver nineteen; besides 3000 Denarii, and a hundred and twenty thousand peeces of Illyrian filver in coin. Besides his chariot were led King Gentius with his wife and children; Caravantius alfo the Kings brother, and certain noblemen of Illyricum. Out of the pillage he gave unto his footmen 45 Denarii apeece, to every Centurion a double proportion, and unto the horsemen a triple. To the alies of the La-C tine nation he allowed asmuch as to citizens; the failers and mariners he made equal with the footmen. Herein he surmounted the triumph of Emplies, for that his fouldiers followed after his triumphant chariot more jocund and merry, and the General was praifed and extolled in many a ditty and ballad. Antias writeth, That of his booty there was railed as much money as came. to twenty millions of Sestertii, over and above the gold and filver that went into the common treasury. But because I could not see how possibly such a sum should be made, I have set down mine author for the thing, now, chule you whether you will believe him. King Gentius with his wife, children, and brother, was by order from the Senat led to Spoletium, there to be kept in ward : all the captives besides were at Rome cast into prison, and there lay. But when the Spoletins refused to take the charge and custody of him and the rest, these Princes were translated from D thence to Igiturvium. There remained besides of the Illyrian prizes two hundred and twenty barks, which being taken from King Gentius, Q. Cassius by the ordinan e of the Senat gave and distributed among the citizens of Corphu, Apollonia, and Derhachium.

The Confulsthat year after they had only walled the territories of the Lignrians, because they. could never train the enemies forth to fight, having done no memorable icrvi execurned to Rime for the choice of new Magistrats in the room of the old. And so the first comitial or court day that came, they created Confuls M. Claudius Marcellus and C. Sulpitius Gallus, The morrow after were elected for Pretors L. Livius, L. Apuleius Saturninus, A. Licinius Nerva. P. Rutilius Calvus, P. Quintilius Varus, and Marcus Fomeius. These Pretors had their government in this mannet! two for the jurisdiction within the City, two for Spain, the other for Sicily and Sardinia. This E year leapt, and the leap day was the morrow after the feast Terminalia. That year died C. Claus dius the Augur, and in his place the colledg of the Augurs chofe T. Quintius Flaminius, Alio M. Fabins Pretor the Flamin of Quirinus the same year departed this life. This year also came King Prusias to Rome with his son Nicomedes. He entred into the City with a great train attending upon him: from the gate he went directly to the common place and the tribunal of Q. Caffins the Pretor. And when there was a great concourse of people about him from all parts; he said that his coming was to worthip the Gods which are the presidents of the City of Rome, as also to salute the people of Rome, and withal to thew his own joy and to with theirs for their happy victory over the two Kings Persens and Gentius, and for that by subduing the Macedonians and Illyrians, they had enlarged their fiegnory and dominion. And when the Pretor made an offer to call Fa Senat for him even that present day if he would so himself the defired two daies respit to see the Temples of the Gods, to view the City, and to visit his good friends and acquaintance, L. Corneli-, us Scipiothe treasurer was appointed to go about with him and shew him all : who also had been fencas far as to Capua for to meet him upon the way also for him and his train about him, there was a sufficient house taken up, where he was kindly and liberally intertained. The third day as-of the people of Rome. Also that the league and alliance with him might be renued. Item that the Gland won by conquest from King Antiochus, which being not by the people of Rome given unto any, the Gauls notwithstanding held in possession, might be conveied unto him by a deed of giff, Last of all, he recommended his fon Nicomedes to the Senat. He found much favor among all them who had been Generals of armies in Macedony. And therefore he obtained directly all other fuits that he made: only as touching the faid lands, this answerhe had. That they would fend certain commissioners to see and view the thing. "And if it appeared and fell out, that the foresaid land "appertained to the people of Rome, and was not passed away by gift to any already, they would repute King Prufias the worthiest man of all other, to receive that donation at their hands. H "But if it never belonged to King Antiochus, and to was plain and evident that the people of " Rome had no right unto it, or if the Gauls had a grant thereof already, Prufias then must be const tent and pardon them, if they were unwilling to gratify him with any gifts prejudicial and in-" jurious to another. Neither could a thing never to freely given, be an acceptable gift, which he " knew the donor may take away from the donce at his pleasure. As for Nicomedes his ion, they " would willingly receive him into their protection at his hands fo recommended. And how si careful and tender the people of Rome was over Kings children committed unt o them to keep, "may appear by Ptolomaus the King of Egypt, With this answer was Prusing dismissed, Order was given that he should be presented with a certain summe of sesterces, and with filver plate to the quantity of 50 pound weight. Also they ordained that his son Nicomedes should have gifts pro- I portionable to that fum which was given Masgaba the son of Masaniffa; also that beatts and all other things appertaining to facrifices, should be allowed unto the King out of the City-chamber. like as to the magistrats of Rome, chuse whether he would flay and offer them at Rome or Prenefe. Also that out of that fleet which rid in the harbor of Brundusium, there should be twenty gallies affigned him to use, until such time as the King were arrived at the fleet which was given him. Finally, that L. Cornelius Scipio should accompany him and never depart from him, but bearthe charges both of him and his retinue about him until they were embarked and on shipboord. It is faid, that the King joied wonderoully at this courtely and kindnes offered him by the people of Rome and that he would needs pay for those presents which were given him: only he commanded his fon to take a gift at the hands of the people of Rome. Thus much have our Hiltorians writ-K ten as touching K. Prusias. But Polybius reporteth, that this King was unworthy the Majesty offo honorable a name, for that he was wont to meet the Embassadors of Rome with his head shaven and a capupon it also to acknowledg and call himself the freed villain and vasfal of the people of Rome, and to testify so much, he wore the badg and token of that degree and condition, At Rome likewise when he entred the Councel-house, he stooped down and kissed the very door fill, calling the Senators Gods, his Saviors, yea, and to have used other speeches not so honorable to the heasers, as bale and unfitting his own person. When he had so journed in and about the City not a bove thirty daies, he took his leave and departed into his own Realm.

To the Reader.

Rom the five and fortieth book forward, all the rest of Livy (to the great maim and blemish of the Latine tongue, and no small grief of learned men) is loft, even 100 books wanting five, like as those ten between the tenth and one and twentieth books, commonly called the second Decad. For as it M appearet by L. Florus the Epitomist there were in all 140: and the arguments of so many remain at this day, by him collected. But if it be true that Francis Petrarch faith, Levy wrote in all 142 : and as Charles Sigonius probably conjettureth, the 26 and 27 Breviaries of L. Florus be wanting of this later number. Hoso all these complete books of T. Livius should miscarry, it is not certainly known. Some hope there is that they are but mis-cast and laid out of the way. For like as within these hundred years some fragments of the story were discovered N in Mogunce: and the last five books now extant, found by Simon Grinaus in the Library of a monastery over-against the City of Worms, and dedicated by Erasmus of Rotterdam unto Charles, the son of William Lord Montjoy, in the reign of Henry the eight of famous memory K. of England, Se. So we are notto despair of the rest. In the mean time, we must make much of these brief summaries left unto us. Even as therefore I have inserted those ten Breviaries in stead of the books: so I thought it not amiss (in hope that one day the very books 0 themselves will come to light) to proceed in the rest following: and the rather for that neither he that translated Livy into the Tuscan language, nor they who have done him into French (as far as I could ever see) bave taken that pains. Umenes came towards Rome. Now because in the Macedonian war he had carried himself indifferent between Perseus and the Romans, there passed a law in general terms, That no Kine might repair to Rome; to the end, that if he were excluded, he should not be reputed an enc-my; nor if he were admitted, acquit and cleered of all fault. Gl. Maxcellus the Consul subdued the Gauls inhabiting the Alps, and C. Sulpitius Gallus the Ligurians. The Embassadors of King Prusias complained of Eumenes, for that he invaded and wasted their borders; and they informed befides, that he had conspired with Antiochus against the people of Rome. At the earnest suit and entreaty of the Rhodians, a league was contracted with them. The Cenfors took a review and survey of the City, wherein were enrolled and fessed 327022 cirizens of Rome. M. Emylius Lepidus was eletted president of the Senat. Ptolomans the King of the Egyptians, was by his yonger brother expelled ont of his realm, but by the means of Embassadors (sent from Rome) he was restored to his Kingdom. Upon the death of Ariarathes King of Cappadocia, his fon Ariarathes came to the crown, and by entercourse and mediation of Embassadors, renewed amity with the people of Rome. This book containeth besides, the wars against the Ligurians, Corsians, and Lustanians, fought with variable fortunes the troubles also in Syria after the death of Autiochus, who left behind him Antiochus his fon, n very child. Neus Tremellius a Tribune of the Commons had a fine set on his head, for that he had contended in a wrongful cause with M. Emylius Lepidus the soveraign Pontifie. The power and authority of the clergie Magistrats, was greater and mightier than before. A law was enalted as conching inordinate fuit for offices. In the survey of the City, there were taxed in the subsidy book 328314 Roman citizens, L. Amylius Lepidus was chosen again president of the Senat. Between the two brethren Ptolomees, who were at variance, there taffed thu accord and agreement, That the one should reign in Egypt and the other in Cyrenx. Ariarathus King of Cappadocia, by the politick plot and forcible power of Demettius King of Syria disposses of bis Kingdom, was by the Senat fet into it again. Certain Embassadors were sent at delegats from the Senat to determine of the litigious ground between Mafanissa and the Carthaginians. C. Mattius the Conful fought against the Dalmaiians, at the first unfortunatly, but afterwards archieved the victory. The occasion of the war with them was this; for that they had made wast upon the Illyrians, who were allies of the people of Rome. The Jame nation Cornelius Nasica the Confut brought in Subjection, Q. Opimius the Consul Subdued the Ligarians beyond the Alps, who had spoiled Antipolis and Nicaa, two Towns belonging to the seignory of the Massilians, Moreover, here are contained the adventures of many Captains in Spain, with no good success. In the 598 year from the foundation of the City, the Confuls so soon as the assembly for election was past and other Consult chosen for the year following, began their office. The cause of this alteration was, because the Spaniards were entred into rebellion. The Embassadors aforesaid who had been sent to take up and decide the controverly between Malanissa and the Carthaginians, made report, That they had found great fore of ship-timber and other matters for a navy at Carthage. Certain Pretors accused by the provinces for avarice, were condemned.

Of the XLVIII, Book.

The Cenfors took a review and tax of the city, wherein were reckened three hundred four and twenty there was a right pull and report that the was before recorded. Upon a report that the chobarzanes the upper of Namidian upon the borders of the Carthagians; conducted by Attachobarzanes the upper of Syphax, M. Porcius Catoper funded in an oration to proclaim war againfite Carthaginians, for that the interteined such a power within their frontiers under a colour againfithatanista, but in trul braifed againfithe Ramain: tombeit Publius Cornelius Nasica gainfit and dissand dissand the matter, where upon ordeined it was, that Embassadors should be sent to Carthage in spial, to observe what they did, and where about they went. Who after they had given the Carthage in the land of the sent they did, and where about they went.

Senat a check and rebute, for that against the covenants of the league, they main ained forces, and were provided of timber and other finff for a navy, they were willing to conclude a peace besween Mafaniffa and them; fo at Masanifia |bould forgo and part with the land in question, But Gilgo the son admilia car, abuft and feditions may, who then was foveraign Magistrate (now it bift anding their Secas promifed to be ruled by the award of the faid Embass adort) in ened them so by his persuasive remonstrances towar upon the Romant, that the Embassadors made so fit to slee and save themselves, or else they had come to a mischief. When they related these news at Rome, the Senat already fet and bent against the Carthaginians, were now by his wards provoked much more. M. Portius Cato performed the funerals of his fon, deceased in his Pretorship, with exceeding small charges, according to his ability, for herias put poor . One Andriicus, who feoully made the world believe, that he nas the fon of Perfeus the King of Maccdony, was fent to Rome. M. Emylius Lepidus, wow fix times chosen President of the Senat by the Cenfors, gave hu fon instreight charge before he died, to carry him forth to turial in a couch without limnen clothes and the purple pall, and not to bestow in other obsequiet above one denier : saying, that the funerals of the greatest and best personages are wont to be enrolled and honoured with the sews of images and tiles, and not with fam prinous expenses. An inquisition there was about the practise of passining and freery. Pubillia and Licinia, who were endited for making away their busbands put in faretier beforeth: Pretor, to be bound in goods, lands, and body for them, and after judicial proceft p fed and their caufe heard, by a decree of their kinsfalk fuffered death. Guluffa the fon of Malaniffa gave intelligence, that at Carthage there was muffering and tenying of Souldiers, rigging and providing of aftertallyeparations no doubt for war : and Publicus Cornelius Natica replied agains, but not hing was to be done inconfiderally, without advise. Thought good it was to fendion Embas dors, for to feethe truth of all, and upon their knowledg to certify. L. Licinius Lucullus and A. Posthumius Albinus the Conful, when they took must ers with severity and rigour, and would not for favour spare any one, but press all, were committed by the Tribuns of the commons, who for their friends could obtain at their hands no reliafe and immunity of fouldiery. By occasion of the wars in Spain, which many times had been untowardly and enfortunally managed, when the Gity of Rome was fo difmaied and danned that there could not be found any one wlo would so much as accept of a marrial Tribunship, or was willing to go in quality of Lieutenant; P. Cornelius Emylianus stepped forth, made offer and professed, that he would undertake any kind of military service what sever should be laid upon him : and by his own example stirred up all the resteathe love of werfare. L.Lucullus the Conful, when Claudius Marcellus (after whom he succeeded) was thought to have quieted all the flaces and nations of Celiberia, Subdued the Vacceans, Camabri ans, and other regioni and nations as yet unknown in Spain. P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus Emyliarus, the fonof L. Paulus, and the nepher of Africanus by adoption, being there amartial Colonel, flew a Parbarian challenger that deficahim. But in the winning of the City Intercatia, he adventured more dangerom enterprife: For he was the first of all other that scaled and mounted over the wall. Setvius Sulpitius Galba the Preter shedbut tadly in abattail against the Portugals. When as the Embaffadors were returned out of Africk, together with the Carthaginian Orators, and Gulusia the son of Masanissa, bringing word, That they found at Carthage both an army and also an armado; though good it was to put to question and debate the matter in the Senat : where Cato and other principal Senators were of opinion and gave advice; to transport an army presently into Astick: but because C. Nasica opined and faid, That be faw as yet no just and sufficient cause of war, agreed it was to sorbear all hostility and force of artist, in cafe the Carthaginians would burn their navy and discharge their army if no, then agreed it was, that the Corfuls next following in place of government should propose as touching the Punick war. When the Theatre was built, which by the Cenfors had been put forth to no kmento frame, and fit up at a price, through the means of Pub Cornelius Natica, who inferred, that it was a peece of work approfitable yea, and huriful to the manners generally of the citizens; by vertue of an alt of Senat demol. shed it was and pulled down; so at the people for along time stood on their feet to behold the pu blick plaies. The Carthaginians at that time took arms contrary to the league, and warred upon Malanissa. But varq eifted they were in field by him (who not with standing he now was four score year old and twelve, yet he uf diotaff his meat fimply without any dainty fauce yea, and to chew his bare bread fill!) and over and besides they deserved to draw upon their head the Roman war.

Of the XLIX. Book.

He beginning of the third Punick war, in the fix hundreth and one year from the Cities foundain I on which within 5 years ofter it began, came to a full and finallend. Much aver fur there wain opinion between M. Porcius Cato whom they reputed for the wif ft, and Scipio Natica, who by the Se nat was judged the best and honestest man in the City. Cato was altogether for the wars, and advised to destroy Carthage quite : Nasica contrarywise dissinaded what he could. Nevertheles, in the endardisned it was. That because against covenant and accord they kept a navy at sea, and had led forth an army out of their borders: alfo for that they entred into arms and levied war upon Malanilla, a friend and confederat to the people of Rome, and received not into their Town, Culusta his fon who was in the company of the Roman Embassadours; war should be proclaimed against them. But before that any forest were embarked and had taken the fea, the Embaffadors of Utica repaired to Rome, yeelding themfolour and all that they had. That embassage, as a special presage to the ifine and event of the way must ceptable and pleasing to the Lord of the Senat, but heavy and grievous to the Carthainians, In Teces tum [a place it was in Campus Martius, wherepon the postimes Terentins took their name were plate ex hibited to Father Dis the infernal God, according to the direction of the books of Sibylla. These had been let out one hundred years before in the first Punick war, and in the five hundreth year and one, after the City was founded. Thirty Embaffadors came to Rome, by whom the Carthaginians presented their Submission. But the sentence of Cato imported and prevailed, to hold still their former determination. and that the Confuls with all freed should fet forward in their journey to the war. Who having paffed the leas and arrived in Affick, received of them three hundred hoftages, whom they had required and demanded; and alfo took into their hands all their armor and weapons, and what furniture of war forver they found at Carthage. They proceeded moreover after all this to command them by warrant and authorier from the LL. of the Senat to build them a new Town for to inhabit in some other place, so that it were ten miles at least remote from the Sea: by which indignity offered, they provoked the Carthaginians to rife and take arms again. L. Martius and M. Manilius the Confuls, began to be fiege and affault Carthage: during which frege and affaults it fortuned that two Colonels unadvifedly adventured to break into the City with their cohorts, at one part thereof where the walls were neglected, and when by the Townsmen they were sore beaten and killed, by the means of Scipio Affricanus they were rescued: by whom also a certain sconce and fort of the Romans, which the enemies by night assailed, with the help of afew horsemen was delivered. Moreover, he saved the camp, against which the Carthagenian sallied forth of their City to give the affault at once upon it with all their forces; by which service he above the rest won great honor. Over and besides, when as the Consul (for the other was gone to Rome to hold the election of Magistrats) seeing the siege and assault of Carthage took no better effect, minded to lead the army against Aldrubal, who with another power of menkept the narrow streights of a certain passage, he counselled the said Cos. first, not to give battel in a place of such desadvantage; but afterwards overweighed and born down by the opinions of the greater number (who envied as well his wifedom as vertue) he a'so entred into the same streights. And when the Roman army, according as he foretold, was discomfited and put to flight, and two cohorts befet round and invested by the enemies, he with certain small cornets of horse returned into those streights, rescued them, and brought them away in safety. Which valour of his, even Cato, (a man otherwise more ready of his tongue to find faults) so recommended in the Senate, that inthese terms be gave out and said, * That all the rest who were emploied in the wars of Affrick, served as shadows and dead men, but Cato had true vigour and spirit indeed. The people of Rome besides cast such a favour and good liking to him, that at the next election, most of the tribes verse of Homer, pricked him for to be Conful, notwithstanding he was by law under age, When L. Scribonius a Tribune of the way of the Commons had promulged a law, That all the Portugals (who according to covenant and composition to see tion, reelded to the people of Rome, and yet by S. Galba were fold in France) should be restored to their oxide diarect. freedom; M. Cato most earnestly pleaded in the behalf of that law, and maintained it. His Oration is extant to be seen, included within his Annals. Q. Fulvius Nobilior, albeit he was by him shaken up and well checked in the Senat, answered in the behalf of Galba. Tea, and Galba alfo, seeing himself at the point to be condemned, took in his arms and embraced his own two fons; being * Prætextati, and a fon f C.Sulpitius whose Guardian he was, and made snch piteous and rusal mone, all the while he spake in his own saufe that the forefaid law was revoked and cancelled. Three Orations of his there are to be feen; two against Libo a Tribune of the Commons and his proposed laws, as touching the Portugals; and one against L. Cornelius Cethegus, in which he confessith and avoweth the killing of the Portugals encamped neer unto him t for that he knew certainly that they after their manner had facrificed an horse and a man, andunder a colour of peace, intended to set upon and charge his army. Andtiicus one of base birth and the most abject lowest condition, who made the world believe that he was King Perseus his son, and thereupon changed his name and was called Philip, having made an escape and sted secretly from Rome (whither Demetrius King of Syria had sent him in regard of this his notorious lie) had many men come flocking unto him, embracing a forged and counterfeit fable of his, as if it had been a true fame and report: by which means he gathered an army together, and either with the good will of the inhabitants, or by force of arms, seized all Macedony and held it in his hands. Now had he devised and framed the pageant in this wife, That Perseus the King had begotten him (for sooth) of a concubine: that he was committed to * one Cyrthesa to be fostered and brought up: to the end that if ought should fall out but Ot, " Creia well anto the K, in that war which he waged with the Romans, there might be ret some seed as it were cuidan, i, to and iffue remaining of the Kings blood and royal race. When Perfeus was deceased, he had his education out in Crete. at Adramyttium until he was 12 years old, supposing him to be his natural father who fostered and kept him, and wift not at all from what flock he was descended. Now it sell out (faith he) that the faid foster father of mine lay very sick; and being at the point of ded h, bewraied at length my birth and parentage; Moreover, that there was a little book given to my supposed mother, sealed with the sign manual of King Perseus which she was to deliver note me when I came once to ripe age, and to be 14 years old: charging her most streightly of all loves, to conceal the whole matter until that time were come: and when I was grown to that age aforesaid, then the book was given me, wherin mention was made of two chests of trea-Sure left for me by my father. Then the woman, who knew full well that I was no child of hers, but only so reputed, bewraied my birth unto me, who was afortime ignorant of of mine own descent : also the woman laid great mait upon me to depart out of those quarters before that Eumenes, a professed enemy to Potleus, came to the knowledg thereof, for fear to be murdered. In which respect I being affrighted and hoping withat to find some aid at the hands of Demetrius, went into Syria; and there first I took heart unto me, and dared openly to profess who I was, and never before. [Thus much of Andriscus this counterfet Kings fon; Heffaly at what time as the for faid counterfet Philip would have invaded and kept it by force of arms, was by the means of the Roman Embassadors, together with the aid of the Achaans defended. Prusias King of Bithynia, a favourer of the basest persons and lewdest vices, was by his ownson Nicomedes murdered, with the help of Attalus King of Pergamus, Another fon he kad, who in fead of the upper row and course of distinct teeth, is reported to have had one entire bone for all, growing out at his gums, When the Romans had sent their Embassadors to conclude a peace between Nicomedes and Pruhas; of which Embas adars the one had his head full of many scars, the other was troubled with the cour in the feet, and the third reputed but blockish of spirit by nature, and none of the wifest; Cato sid, stat there was an embassage head it is, foot-less, and heart-less. In Syria, which at that time had for their King, one indeed of the line and race of Perieus K. of Macedony, but another Prulias np and down, for cowardife, idlenes, and lafe mind; it fo fell out, that whiles he haunted taverns, flews, and brothelbonfes, and lay there altogether, Ammonius fwai'd the Scepter and raigned as King : by whose pratise the Kings friends, alfo Laodice the Queen, and Antigonus the son of Demetrius came to their end and were killed, Malanilla King of Numidia, a man above four score and ten years old, a samous Prince and every way excellent, reelded to nature and died. Among other youthful parts which he performed to his dying day, this is one, That in this old age of his he was so lusty, that after the four score and fixth rear of his life he got a boy. Among his three fons, Mycipla (the eldeft) Gulussa and Manastabal, who also had knowledge in the Greek tongue, Publius Scipio Emylianus divided the administration of the Kingdom: for their father kad left it in common for them all and hadgiven order to part it at the difcretion of the same Scipio. Likewise, he persuaded Phamias the commander under Himilto of the Carthaginian Cavalry, (a valiant warrior, and whom the Carthaginians emploied most of all others in fervice) to revolt with his men of arms and to turn Roman. Of those three Embassadors above said who were fent to Malanista, Claudius Marcellus was cost away in a tempest upon the Sea, and swallowed up of the wives in a guft. The Carthaginians murdered in their Councel-chamber Aldrubal nephew of Malanilla, and their Pretor for the time being, upon suspition of treason. This seasons of theirs arose hereupon for that he was neer in kindred and blood to Gulussa, who friend dand succoured the Romans. Publius Scipio Emylianus, when he suedto be Ed lo, was by the people propounded and nominated for Consul: and when as by law he might not for his yong yeers be created Conful, hard hold there was about him: " The law Anwiles the commen laboured with might and main for him, and the nobles and Lords of the Senat gainannalu, where- faid is a good while: but in fine, he was despenfed with, not wiel standing the law in that behalf, and Lucius Villius ercated Conful, Marcus Manilius (Pro conful) forced certain Cities fituate about Catthage. * Conna Confulhip, terfet Philip, after he had flain M. Iuventius the Pretor and Q Calius, and together with them defeaunder 43 years ted the army, was in Macedony vanquished himself and taken prisoner; and so Macedony was recovered of age, and this again which had been loft before.

Archage, which took up in circuit the composi of sour and twenty miles was with exceeding pain and eravail besieged and won by peece-meal: first, under the conduct of Mancinus the Lieutenant; afterwards of Scipio the Conful, unto whom without lot the province of Africk was extraordinarily granted. The Carthoginians having made a new peer, (for that the old haven was choked and stopped up by Scipio) and gethered secretly in a small time a good feet, fought a battail at Sea unfortunally. Moreover, the camp of Aldrubal their General , pitched in a place of most difficult access neer the Town Nepheris, was forced, and lis army defeated by Scipio : who also in the end wan the very City of Carthage, in the seven hundred year after it was first founded. The greatest part of the spoil and pillage there found, was restored to the Sicilians, from whom it had been taken. In the utmost extremity and final destruction of that City, when Aldrubal had yeelded and submitted to Scipio ; his wife (who some daies before could not obtain at her hubands hands to abandon the Town and flie to the conqueror) cast her self with her two children headlong from the Castle into the mids of the staming fire, wherewith the City burned. Scipio, following the example of Lis father Emylius Paulus who had conquered Macedony, fet forth certain solemn plaies and passimes; wherein the renegats and supitives be presented and objected to sa vage beasts. The causes of the Achaan war be here reported. The Roman Embassadors who had been beaten and ill intreated by the Achaans, were fent unto Corinth, to fever and difioin those cities (which hadbeen under the seignory of Philip) from the general diet and parliament of the Ackaans.

Uintus Pompeius the Consul subdued the Termestins in Spain: with whom verily as also with the Quintus Pompeius the Confut Juvanea toe sterner uns an aparte and a second very and numbring Numantins, by occasion of his infirmity and sicklinels, he concluded peace. A review and numbring of the citizens was taken by the Cenfors: whetein were enrolled four hundred twenty eight thousand, " Or rights three hundred forty two polls. At what time as the Macedonian Embaffadors came to complain of D. 328342, Junius Syllanus, the Lord Deputy over them, for that he took their money, and nevertheless made an hawork of the Province, and therupon the Senat was willing to have the hearing of their complaints: T. Manlius Torquatus the father of Syllanus, exhibited a request, and obtained, that the inquiry and decision of such a matter at this might be referred over and committed into him. And after he had fitten upon this commission at home in his own house and found his son guilty, he both condemned him and put him away: up, when afterwards he had hanged himself, for that was his end, he would not be so much at present at his funeral, but according to his ordinary manner and custome, sat in his house, attending all clients and commersto him for counsel. Q. Fabius the Pro-consul, after he had managed the war in Spain right professorly, marred all with this foul blot and spot of dishonor, in that he contrasted a peace with Viriaus, upon even and equal conditions. This Viriaus by a practife completed by Servilius Ca-plo, was tree beough murdered by traitors, and of his own army wat much bewailed. At his death he was rung out of this world with a notable peal of * farewel, and right honorably enterred: an excellent man, and most brave Captain for the space of thirteen years, during which time he warred with the Romans, and ever for the most part went away with the winning hand.

*HE Numantins forced by great extremities, and ffamine especially, murde ed themselves in course by turns. After the City was won, Scipio Affricanus rafed and destroicd it interly: and cover is triumphed, in the fourteenth year after the ruin of Carthage. P. Attilius the Conful disputched and ended the war in Sicily, with the foresaid fugitives. Aristonicus the son of King Eumenes, invaded Asia and held it to his own use; whereas by the last will and tostament of King Attalus, it was bequeathedas a legacy unto the people of Rome, and ought to have been freed. Against him P. Licinius Crassusthe Consultand Archbishop besides (athing never done or seen before) took a journey with an army out of Italy, and in a battel was overthrown and lost his life. M. Perpennathe Conful overcame Aristostonicus, and received him by surrender Q Pomponius and Q Metellus were eletted Cenfors, the first Commoners that ever both together attained to that dignity. A review was taken by the Cenfors where in were numbred 368823 citizens, besides orphans and widows. Q. Metellus the Censor gave his advife and opinian, that all men social be compelled to take wives, for the breeding of children. His Oration to that purpose is extant which Augustus Casar, at what time as he went in handto joyn in marriage all the three states and degrees of the City, rehearsed in the Senat, as if it had been penned to sit ihase times wherein we now live. C. Atinius Labeo, a Tribune of Commons, commanded Q. Metellus the Cenfor (who in the review and new choise of the Senaiors did him that disgrace as to Icave him one) to be pitched headlong from the rock Tarpeia but the rest of the Tribunes assisted the Censor all that ever they could, that this commandment should not be executed. When Carbo, a Tribune of the Com proposed a bill, that it might be lawful to create the same man Trib. of the Commons so aften as one would; P. Africanus distinaded this law in a most grave and puthy Oration:wherein he used these words especially, That he judged Tib, Gracchus to have been justly flain for his deferts. Gracchus on the other side maintained the law, and pleaded that it might passe: but Scipio imported and prevailed in the end. In this book are related the wars between Antiochus king of Syria, and Phrantes king of the Parthiums as also the troubles of Ægypt, which stood as then in no better terms. Ptolomeus surnamed Evergetes. for his exceeding cruelty grew hateful and odious to his own subjects: and when the people had set on fire and burned his royal palace, he fled by fealth into Cyprus; and when the king dom was by the people made made over to his sister Cleopatta, whom (after he had destoured by force her daughter), a virgin, and so taken her to wife) he had turned away in great despleasure and malice unto her; he killed that son he had by her, in Cyptus, and sent unto the mother the head, hands and feet. Certain seditions were raifed by the Triumvirs, Fulvius Flaccus, C. Gracchus, and L. Carbo, who were created for the decision of land. Against whom P. Scipio Africanus made resistance: but being in perfect health, strong and tuffy, he went home to his house as it might beto day, and was found dead in his bed-chamber the the next morrow. His mife Sempronia was deerly suspected to have given him a cup of porsonic h reupon especially, because she was lister to the Gracchi, between whom and Asticapus there was or doe and enmity: Howbeit, there was no question and streight enquiry made how he came to his death, When his head was once laid the Triumviral feditions before faid, brake forth into a light and hot fire. C. Semprothus the Conful fought against the lapida, first unfortunatly. But soon after he made amends for that los received, with a victory archieved by the special valor of C. Junius B. utus, the same man who before had conquered Postugal.

To the Reader.

The history of Tinus Livins, as it was by him passing well penned otherwise, and none, thereto in Latine comparable: so in the calculation and date of times, which they call Chronology (a fingular light togive direction in a story) he is somewhat detective and unlike himfelf, to as he cannot be praifed without exception. But if aman consider the huge volumes which he wrote, and namely, in his declining age; the variety and disagreement. of former authors, whom he followed, who before him faulted also in this point, and whereof he much complaineth; he is to be pitied and pardoned if his memoty failed fomewhat in this behalf. For where shall we find a man that is anarra oroge, omnique ex parte beatus? And indeed, if we weigh the thing aright, as it was a profession by it sell, and required a whole man: so, many travelled therein alone, and they that performed well bit it only, deserved high thenks and commendation. And to let many others pass, how worthily is T. Pomponim Attiem praised by Cietro his friend, for digefting the head Magistrates of 700 years in one book? As for Verrius Elactus, who lived in the time of Angustus Calar, he collected a catalogue and regitler of the chief Ruleis. of Rome, how they were cholen facceffively, and how they governed from time to time : which as he caused to be cut and engraven in a marble wall within the Capitol for a perpetual memory to posteries: so thereby he deserved also to have his own statue erected near the Temple of Vestas for an everlatting memorial of fo great a benefit But what is there fo durable, that time wasteth not? What so conspictions and evident, but troublesome dates may overwhelm and hide in oblivion? Thus amidft that havock which the Goths and Vandals made in Italy, there remained n tone fourth part extant of Liviesfloty: thus in that generall confusion of Rome, these tecords of Verrius Flaces: Were defaced broken, and buried deep under the ruins of the Capitoll and other stately ediffices. But the revolution of times, as it hath brought to light again some reliques of Lay 1 (0 it. hath discovered also those marbles of Verrius: for in the time of Paul the third, Pope of Rome, the fragments of the faid flones were digged out of the ground between the Roman Forum and the broad treet Fig Sacra; brought forth alfo & laid abroad in the Capitol to the view of the world. HISTORY OF TITUS LIVIUS.

Compiled according to the Tables and Records of Verrius Flaceus in the Capitoll, and fet out with most profitable Notes, shewing the variety and disagreement of Authors about the names of the Roman Confuls.

The causes of dissent and repugnance in Historiographers as touching the computation and relating of the years from the foundation of the (ity of Rome.

Ince we intend to fet forth a Kalender or Register of the Confuls mentioned in the Hittory of Livius, which by reason of uncertainty, obscurity, and discordance of the times, is so dark and intricate, that not only the learned and most experienced Historians of our age, but the best writers of the Roman story in ancient time very often complained thereof; we think it not impertment to our purpole bief-ly to fearch into the causes of this diffent: which being once known, we may follow that account of the times, which seemeth to accord best with the Historicall truth, and to be grounded upon the authority and testimony of the most authenticall and approved writers. For feeing that an History (as Cicero hath most truly said) is the witness of times; what is more unfitting for it, than to mils and want that which is the chiefest point therein, and without due and diligent reckoning made, to be ignorant what was first and what was last done? It seemesh therefore, that of this diversity in the account and computation of the Roman Confuls, there be three

The first is, for that the year in which the first Consuls entred into that Magistracy, is by the Roman Historiographers, not after one fort but diverfly fet down. For Diony fins fa most diligent writer of the Acts of Romans) in his first book, in the end of the fourth and beginning of the flith, reporteth, that the KK, reigned 244 years: which also is collected out of the yearly computtation gathered by Varro and approved by the authority of others. For Meffala reporteth, how upon the expulsion of the KK, which happed in the 244 year after the foundation of the City, the Romans were ruled under the yearly government of Confuls. To which opinion Livy also subferibeth in thered of his first book, taying, that the regiment of KK, continued 244 years from the foundation of the City, unto the freedom and liberty thereof. But Eutropius in his first book writern that the leven Kings reigned in Rome 243 years : which account agreeth with Sex. Ruffar in his abridgment. In which variety this is to be observed, that these two last named, reckon the years only of every Kings raign, and out of the whole and gross sum leave out the year of the interreign, which Dionysius, Livius, Meffala, and the reft infert between, and that right truly and upon good reason: for after the death of Romulus, the interreign continued one year, Confider then and examine the thing diligently, and ye shall find, that in reckoning the years of every Kings reign in severall, Eutropius and Sextus Enflus both, attribute as many years of the Kings government, as Denis, Livy, and thereft : fo that this difference is not much. But others there be (as Enfebius hath delivered in his Chronicles) who write, that the KK reigned but 243 years, and take the interregency withall: whose judgment, Orosius, Iornandes, and Beda feem to follow. For Orofins in the fift chapter of his fecond book recordeth, that Brutus the Conful in that very year namely the 244, put his own fons to death. The Kings reigned not precisely fo many years just, but, for that some (and namely, Romalas) went over some months and dates, Dionyfins and Livius reckoned them for a full year, and laid it to Tarquinius Priscus: but the other above named, together with Eusebius, lest out those odd months and daies (because they made not up a compleat year) and affigned but only seven and thirty years to the reign of King Prisons. To this may be added another reason of the like nature: namely, that as diversalthors have doubtfully reported the year, fothey are no more certain of the month and day on which the first Consuls began their government. For Plutarch in his Problems writeth, that they entred upon the first day of January: but Macrobius in the first book of his Saturnalia and seventh chapter, feemeth to imply that they took their Confols place the first of June, saying, (according to the opinion of others.) That June took the name of Junius Brutus: for that in this months and namely, upon the first day thereof (according to a vow whereto he was obliged by the banishment of Tarquin) he solemnized a sacrifice to the goddess Carnea upon mount Calius. Others again write, how this hapned the 24 of February; grounding herein upon the old antiquities and records of flone, together with the testimony of Ovid, who in the second book of his King Tarquin with his fons then fled: The Confuls yearly bear

The foveraign rule at Rome: sincethat, no King ever raign'd there. Some there are besides of opinion, that they entred the first day of July: and of their mind seemeth Joachimus Perionius to be, in his third book of the Greek Magistrates. In this repugnancy therefore of opinions, very doubtfull it is which to follow. As for that, of Plutarch, it hath long fince been clearly and learnedly confuted by two great and excellent clarks, Omphrius Panvinius, and Sigonius: fince it is plain that it was the fix hundred year from the foundation of the City, and not before, that the Confuls began their government the first of January, But in setting down the certain day, they themselves are not well agreed. For Sigonius after Martianus inclineth this way and faith, That the first day of the Confuls government was the fix and twentieth day of May. But Panvinius thinketh that the first Consuls were created the 26 day of February, And this diverfity is found not only in the day when the first Consuls took their government, but also in the time after ensuing. What was the usual day of any month whereon the Consuls were wont to begin their Magiltracy, a man can hardly find any certainty before the fix hundred year from the Citles foundation. In the four and fortieth year verily after the Kings were exiled the fift day of July, as Livy writeth, was the ordinary day for yearly. Magistrates to take their place: but how many years following, that order continued, or at what time it was changed, he shewed not before he cometo the three hundred and two year, and then he faith in his third book, That the thirteenth of May was the ordinary day for Magistrates to begin their government. Thus much at least wife we may collect by him (when he saith that this time was solemn) that he meant not two or three years only, but many. For that is properly called folemn, which is by law usually obferved. Again, we read a little after the beginning of the fift book, that this time also was altered: for whereas the fift day of December was the usual time that Magistrates began to execute their office, he faith, that it was changed, in these words, The principall Nobles and Lords of the Senat, were it upon the default or the infortunity of their Generals (that to shame'ull an overthrow was received Jopined and advited, not to expect and flay for the ordinary time of the election, but prefently to create new military Tribunes in Confuls authority, who should enter into their government the first day of October, Sec. Which opinion of theirs imported, and the whole house accorded to it: whereupon the other Tribunes gainfaid it. But Sergins and Meginius withflood this AS of the Senat, and denied flatly to refign up their dignity before the eleventh of December, the ordinary day of taking their oath and beginning their Magistracy. And a little after, within one page, he sheweth that the usual day of entrance into government was a litered from the eleventh of $ilde{D}_{e^+}$ cember to the first of September, laying, When this speech was received with a general applause of fift of July should be the ordinary day. And this also I find was changed to another, what soever it was, for named it is not; and therefore uncertain. But this happed in the four hundred and thirteenth year after the Cities foundation: as Livy about the beginning of the eighth book sheweth in these words; And when the Consuls were commanded to resign up their Magistracy before the time, to the end that new Confuls might the fooner be created, against fo great troubles of war, o. For in these words [The sooner, o.]he declareth that the usual day of entier into government was then changed. But as it is not certainly fet down what day this was ; fo the other was as well known: for loon after, and namely, the eighth year following it was appointed, to wit, the first day of July. Immediatly therefore (quoth he) the new Confuls, L. Emplins Mamercus, and Cn, Plantins were enjoyned that day (oven the first of July) on which they began their office, to agree and part between themselves their Provinces. As for the month, wherein for the all men, and that the Nobles and Lords of the Senat Sec. But this day was kept but a few years.

For about fix years after, he faith, by occasion that both Confuls lay fick, it was ordained that the most part the assembly for election of Magistrates was holden, we read it was February; like as the thirteenth of March was ordinary for them to begin their government. For this day held alwaies, during the second Punick war and the Macedonian, and longer than fo. Thus Livy testifieth in many places (which to quote is needless) as in the fixt book of the second Puni. k war, and in the beginning of the first book as touching the Macedonian. By which, who seeth not that there is great variety in the month and day both, whereupon the Magistrates were wont to begin their rule? But whereas all the certainty in computation and account of the time dependent upon a precife, exact, firm, and fetled reckoning of years months, and daies; and feeing that in Lieverflory it is neither expresly shewed, what year, month, or day, the Magistrates began their government, nor precisely noted when the reckoning altered; confidering also that nothing therein is more wavering and inconstantly delivered than the very usual day of entring into Magistracy: what marvel is there if authors diffent fo much about the computation of the times? whiles one beginneth at this month, another at that: whiles some, I say, ascribe these Magistrates created to this year, others attribute the same to another?

Thirdly, there being great difference between Diony fins and Livy, as well about the reckoning of the times and years, as the acts and affairs that therein passed; all seemeth to have risen hereupon, that the putpose of Livy was not to deliver exactly the acts and occurrents of greatest antiquity which hapned in the State of the people of Rome and which by many writers aforetime had.) been most diligently set down and penned to posterity: but to record and write those thingsespecially, which from the time a little before the second Punick war had been atchieved by the people of Rome unto the age wherein himself lived. But because (as Polybins most wisely and pithily writeth) a generall flory cannot be understood by particular registers; and for that an Hillotiographers fludy & endeavour ought to be employed rather in an univerfall treatife, than in particular discouries: therefore, lest so great a piece of work as his, wanting a beginning, should seem maimed & unperfect; in the formost 20 books he slightly & briefly ran over the deeds of the people of Rome from the foundation of the City, unto the beginning of the fecond Punick war, But Dionyfius professing purposely to describe the ancient monuments of the Romans, thought it his part to overpass and omit nothing worthy of remembrance, but most curiously and exactly hath delivered all things pertinent, either to the calculation of the times or discourse of affairs, infomuch as those things whereof Livy hath scantly made 3 books he hath declared at large incleven. Hereupon if a mantead in Dionysius, the antient beginning and original of the Roman Empire, and examine wel the times how they are by him digested & compare the same with the brevity in Livy, no doubt he will prefer the diligence of the former before the overhaltinels of the later, But if the indifferent reader confider the purpole and intent of them both, he will yield unto either of them their due praise; whereas Livy making haste to other matters, hath either let passor more flightly handled tome things, he will judge him worthy rather to be excused then reproved for it.

To these three causes above rehearsed, others also might be adjoyned; namely, the ordering of the years by Romulus, and the variety as touching that year wherein Rome was founded: but it may fullise only to touch these & point unto them with the finger. Howbeit, this we think good to advertise and admenish the reader by the ways that albeit in the digesting and reckoning of the Cost we have let before our eyes to follow the marble tables and monuments of Verrius Flacent and according thereunto have framed and applied the computation of the years; yet that year before the 250 as also the other, which Verrine rejected, we have inserted with the rest, that our account might fall out just with the sum of the years, as they are collected by Varro. Which, before us, Opuphrius Passinius a most learned man hath done in his Kalender, thinking that the year which Verrises and they that followed him rased out was the 423, and therefore he hath put it to the rest without Consuls, according to the Capitoline records.

Of the computation of times ufually observed by the Romans, and of the year of the Cities foundation.

He calculation of years was taken and observed by men in old time divers and fundry waies. The Achaens (as we read) received it from the revolution of the stars: the Argives from their women Priests; as for example, il Chrysis luch a year were chief Priest to offer factifices, they counted the number of years from the laid Chryfis. But many have derived and fetched the course and consequence of their acts and affairs, from the years before Trey was built, or essente the winning thereof, Howbeit, from the 408 year after the captivity thereof, by occasion of the Olympian games, which Hercules first instituted in the honour of his great grandsre by the mothers side and which by his fon Iphiclus (or Iphicus, as some will have it) were renewed that years from that time (I say) they began to number the years by the Olympiads, especially among the Crecians, whole flory (as Enfibius affirmeth) is not of any credit but from the time of the first Olympias. The Hebrews (like as other nations in the East) received the denomination and reckoning of the years from their KK. The Athenians, from their Eponymi (as they cailed them) but that in their Archarefia, that is the election of their Magistrates] which were wone to holdfor certain doies about the beginning of the year, they counted in this wile, देनी जुनवेगात जन्मवादावा न्य Benato n'er Penaton i.e. the tenth creleventh of the first Prytancia. And hereof it leemeth, that the name cometh 72 2 200 pure; as if from thence, their acts received both the time and also the name. After the example of the athenians and others, the Romans reckoned their daies, madetheir Kalender, and registred their acts by such and such Confuls; noting thereto otherwhiles the year from the Cities found tion. But about it there is much more divertity in authors, than about that wherein the first Consuls took their government. And seeing the clearing and declaration of that point is not impertinent to this place, briefly we will rehearle the opinions of authors as touching the time when the City of Rome wasfounded.

To begin therefore at them, who (according to the common received opinion of others) have written longer ago and further off, Timaus Siculus (I know not upon what reason induced) hath recorded, how the City was built by Romulus much about the time that Carthage in Affrick by the Tyrians, namely, in the 38 year before the first Olympias.

L.Cincius (a Senator of Rome by calling) faith it was in the fourth year of the twelfth Olympias: Q. Fabius Pictor (a most ancient writer of the Roman story and of greatest credit) attributeth is to the first year of the eight Olympias.

Polilius Megapolitanus and Diodorns Siculus quote the second year of the 7 Olympias. Appollodorus Q. Lutatius (atulus, (Cornelius Nepos, Eratosthenes, M. Porcius Cato, Dionysius Halicarn's faus, and Theophilus Antiochenus, name the first year of the 7 Olympias. M. Verrius Flaceus (the avoncher of the Capitoline flone-records) T. Liwius, C. Julius Solinus,

Cleme :s Alexandrinus, and others, will have it to be the fourth year of the 6 Olympias

L. Taruntius Firmanus, M. Terentius Varro, T. Pomponius Atticus, M. Tullius Cicero, Augustus Cafar.C. Plinius Secundus, Plutarchus Charonaus, Domitianus Cafar Augustus, P. Cornel, Tacnus Cassi. us Dio, A. Gellius, L. Septimius Severus Augustus Censorinus, M. Julius Philippus Angustus, Eusebius Pamphil, Cafarien fis, Eutropius, Paulus Orosius, Paulus Diaconus Longobardus: and after the time of C, Cafar Dictator, the common opinion of the people of Rome (which we also go by) will have the City to be founded the hird year of the fixt Olympias.

But by what motives and reasons each one of these anthors is induced, & whereby they would feem to confirm their several opinions, needless it is in this place for to declare : both because the speculation hereof pertaineth properly to another profession, and also for that (besides Plutarch in Romulus, Solinus in the 1, chapter of his Polyhistor, and Camers in his annotation thereupon) the question hath been so throughly handled by Onuphrius Panvinius in the first book of his Calen-der that the thing requireth no further examination.

Now for the day on which the foundation of the City of Rome was laid by Romulus, it was the *eleventh day before the Calends of May, called Parilla or Pahlia, Now was this a fellival day to *2: of april. Pales the goddess of shepherds, celebrated by the said shepherds upon the eleventh Calends of May, in the fields and country villages, for the chafing away of wolves, for the preferration of their thip and cattell from dileases, or for the fase yearing and bringing forth their young: whereupon they were called Parilia. Of this matter writeth Properties in his fourth book, in this wife:

A feast shere was, Palilia, our fathers did it call, And on that day they first began, for Rome to build a wall,

Ovid also in the fourth book of his Fasti:

A time full meet they chose, with pough the plot to mark, Dame Pales was hard and so began the wark.

The same is avouched by M. Tullius, Plutarch, Solinus and others. And that these Public were solemnized ordinarily the eleventh day before the Calends of May, appeareth as well by the old marble Calenders, as also by the same authors before rehearied.

Of the first soveraign Magistrates of the City of Rome, namely, of the KK, who were in number seven.

LL forts of policies and governments in a Common-weal which are fet down and named by ancient Writers, the City of Rome (were it by the fatali course of deftiny or upon some troubles in the State) hath received and endured every one: so as no Commonweal in manner there can be found, wherein they succeeded so one after another, as they did in the very City of Rome. For in the beginning, the KK, ruled it; but when they for their exceffive outrage and inordinate lust exercised upon their Citizens and subjects, were depoted and expelled, the Coff and after them the Tribunes military in Coff authority) held the foveraignty. But in process of time, when this frame and form of Common-weal (timply the bett) was by the outrage of the two Gracchi (Saturninus and Drufus Tribunes of the Commons) put out of joynt and troubled, untill such time as their power and authority was by Syllatent in twain, and the Commons differzed of their lands and killed : then the administration of the Common-weal was restored again to the Nobles and principal persons of the City. But at length, when it was oppressed again by the civill war of Pompey and Cafar, the soveraign rule of the State was devolved upon the Empire of Cafar alone; wherein, being first shaken a sew years before, through the wicked infolency and lust of the three Triumvirs, it continued untill the time that it fell to utter tuin. We therefore will briefly go through all these sorts of government, in that successive order as they followed one after another; and first begin with the KK.

chim. Likewise Dionysius in the first book, which he repeateth also in the second: and Plut arch in Numa different not from them, howfoever in Romulus, he writeth, that he departed this world in the 37 year of his age. Solinus in like manner rehearing his worthy acts attributeth unto his raign 37 years. Only Eutropius (1. book 4.chap.) alloweth unto him 39 years : but Cufpinian thinketh very well that the Copy is corrupt. This Prince having raigned (according to the more common received opinion of au-Omalus, the founder of the City, reigned thors) 37 years; in which time, he laid the 37 years: for io many Livy affigneth unto first ground-work of the Roman Empire, with excellent laws and ordinances, and established both civill and also military discipline. departed this life upon the Nones of July, which day was called afterwards, None Capro ina: by occasion that he in mustering and reviewing his army at the lake of Capra, was conveyed out of mens fight: wherenpon the people fled as amazed at the fudden death of their King, as Plutarch & Dionyfius do witness. This Romalus after his * deification was named Quirinus, of * Apothebis, which furname Ovid in his * Kalender givethe Foff 2. these reasons.

Some read thus, * Latinis. * Arma. * Romanus vicerat, but corruptly.

Sive quod basta quirm, priscu est ditta * Sabinu ? Bell icus a telo, uenit in * astra Deus ; Sive suo regi nomen possure Quivites, Seu quia * Romanu junzerat ille Cures.

A spear, old Sabins Quiru call'd, which Romulus us'd in fight:

This martial man a god became, and fo Quirinus highr, Quirites eke his subjects liege, their King this name might give;

might give;
Or elie the Curets, whom he brought with Romans tor to live.

That he was base born, and could not avouch his own father, beside other writers, Plut arch especially affirmeth in his Theseus. Howbeit, the old opinion went cutrant; that he was by Mars begot in stealth of a vestall virgin, Isia, Rhes. or Sylvins, for so many names there go of heriand that first he was called Romus, of Ruma, which signifieth a teat or pap, and afterwards by way of fluttery, Romelius.

Interregents.

Or one year after the death of Romulus the noblesfell to variance & strove who should be K.but by reason, that no one person excelled above the rest in that state so newly founded, there grew severall factions & debates in their head-corporations. They who were descended from the Sabins (because after the death of Tatins none of them raigned with Romulus in equall fociety) were defirous to have a K. created out of their body, because they would not forgo their hold and possession in the Empire. But the old Romans could not away with a stranger-King. Howbeit, as different as they were in affections, all were willing to fet up a K. as having not tafted yet the sweetness of liberty. The Peers moreover mightily feared (by reafon that the neighbour States bordering round about were provoked againtt them) left fome forraign force might affail their City left thus without foveraign government, and the army without a leader. Whereupon the two hundred Nobles agreed among themselves to enter into an affociation of rule, and made ten Decuries : and in every Decury created one to have the foversignty over the reft. These Senators were then 100 in number, as Livy faith, and according to Plutarch a hundred and fifty, But Dionyfins writeth, that there were two hundred of the Sabins & as many Romans. After this they cast lots; and their Decury unto whom the lottery first fell, ruled the City: howbeit, not all of them at once, but one alone had the regall ornaments, and the Lictors going before him. Five daies he governed and no longer; and so by this order in course, the nobles of every Decury governed the City fifty daies. For after five daies determined the whose lot was first to govern in that Decury, delivered up unto the fecond the impetiall dignity together with the enfigns thereof: and he again, when his five daies were expired, unto a third, and so to the terch. Thus when these ten first Interregents had passed one 50 daies a second Decury of Senators in like manner ruled the City other 50 daies; and thus they went round through all untill they had fulfilled a years space inthis regency. This government was of the thing it felf called Interregnum, which name it still retained afterwards, and the men likewife were named Interreges. In this year therefore was the Magifiracy of the Interregents first devised among the Romans. And not only after the death of Romulus the State was ruled by Interregency. but also after the decease of Numa, Tullins, and Ancus Kings. In like manner during the time of the free State and Common-weal, after the time of yearly Magistrates expired, the said government took place very often before the creation of new: for they held the affembly for elections. wherein new governors were by the people created. Now the office and charge of this interregent was, during the time of his regency (which ordinarily palled not five daies) to execute all those functions in the City which belonged either to KK, or Coff, namely, to minifter justice, to rule the Common-weal, to hold a Senat, and there to propound the affairs of State, and lastly, to summon the general assembly for chusing new Magistrates. As touching the beginning of Interregents, Dionylius in his fecond book, Livy in his first, Plut arch in Numa, Sext, Ruffus, Eusebius and other old writers, have written at large,

Numa Pompilius the fecond K, raigned 43 years.

Ne year of Interregency being thus accomplished, the people of Rome thought this a grievous and heavy manner of government; and the Commons grumbled that their fervitude was manifold more than before, as having two hundred Lords over them instead of one. Which when the Senators perceived, they agreed at last upon this point, That the old Senators should create a King, whom they would, so he were not one of their own body and degree. Whereupon Numa Pompilius (for that in justice & wisdom he excelled all other) was called out of Cures a City of the Sabins, to be their King. That he raigned three and forty years, all accord, save Entropins, Ensebins, and Caffiodorus (late writers) who let down but one and forty, as Onuphrius and Sigonius have obferved. Of this K. Dionyfius in the fecond book, Livy in his first, Solinus in his fecond chapter, Plutarch Pliny, and Eutropius in his life; inlike fort, Valerius Maximus have delivered much in record. He died not much above the age of 80 years, as Plutarch writeth; for born hewas (as he tellifieth) the same day whereon Romulus laid the first foundation of the City namely, the twelfth Calends of May. Now forthe name of Numa, tome tay it was the forename of Pompilius. But out of Sextus Pompeius it appeareth, that neither Tullins nor Numa were forenames, as also by this conjecture, for that the fons of Numa are by Diony sius called by other fundry names divers from the family. Some thought therefore that Numa, Ancus, Aruns, Volufus, Drufus, Faustus, Julus, Mammurius, and certain other furnames, were at first forenames, as Marlianus in his Annals hath very well noTullus Hostilius, the third King of Rome, reigned 32 years. Juma being deceased, the Interregency took place again : during which time an Act of Senat passed, wherein by the approbation of the Commons and advice of the Nobles, Tullus Hoftilius was created the third K. of the Romans, in the 81 year after the foundation of the City. Who having raied Alba, commanded the Albansto be translated to Rome. Their Com-mons he made free denizens, and the principall Nobles he took into the order of Senators, After Numa he raigned 32 years, as all writers most constantly affirm. He perished, as Diom fine witnesseth, by occasion that his house was on fire, wherein his wife and children and all their houshold besides were consumed and burnt. Some fay, that his palace took fire by lightning through the ire of the gods, for that he had forlet some sacrifices and holy rites: others write, that it was occasioned by the treacherous pra-Stife of Anous Martius who reigned next after bim. Of him Dionyfius writeth in his 3 book: That he carried before him the name of Hoffus it appeareth by this, that both his father and grandfire bare the faid name. A Prince he was, not only far unlike to Numa, but also more fierce and front than Romalus.

Ancus Martins, the fourth King of Romans, reigned 24 years. Ing Tullius being departed this life, there was an Interregent by the Nobles declared, who held the affembly for election in the 114 year from the foundation of the City: wherein the people created Ancus Martinsthe fourth K, of the Romans, and the Senators approved the same. He built Hoffin a town 16 miles difrait from the City of Rome; and fought feven battels, Livius, Diony lius, and Solinus lay, that he feigned 24 years ; but Eulebins, Entropius, and Calliodorus, 27. What death he died, neither Livy inhisfirst book, nor Diony fine in his 3.do fet down: notwithstanding that by them his noble acts are fet out at large. Now Ancus (as Sex. Pompeinshath reported) is he called, who hath an arm bowing inward, so as it cannot be put firaight forth.

L. Tarquinius Priicus, the fifth K. of Romans,

This Tarquinus being left by Ancus (when he died) guardian to his children, was the first that ambitiously intercepted the kingdom to himself; he sent the sons of Ancus, during the time of Interregency, out of the way, as it were to hunding and made an oration unto the people to win their hearts & affections to himself; the state of the people and authority of the Nobles, he was by the Interregent declared K, in the 170 year after the soundation of Rome, and in the 41 Olympiat. This poble Prince as well for warlike prowels as peated by Policy and government, at the length (being above sounderover year old) was forelaid by the secret trains of of the two sons of Ancus

Martius, in the eight and thirty year of his reign, according to Livy and Dionyfius, whole judgment we follow : or in the 37, as Solimus, Meffala, Ruffus, Entropius, Caffiodorus, Eufebins, and Bodas write; like as we have before shew. ed. Prifens he was furnamed afterwards, because he lived before Tarquinius Superbus, faith Sex. Pomponius, unto whom accord Dionyfius and Laurentius Valla: who writeth, that the addition of Prifius was given tinto him, not by men of that time wherein he lived, but by the age following But Livy the weth plainly, that he had the furname of Priscus given him, eventhen when he came first into the City, because he was born before Superbus. He also was called Lucume, and was the fon of Demargtusthe Corinthian, descended from the family of the Brachiades.

Servius Tullius the fixt K.ofthe Romans, reigned four and forty years

A Frer Prifeus Tarquinius was flain prefent-Aly Servius Tullius was the first that (without any election of the people, yet wish the generall confent of the Nobles) sook upon him the Roman kingdom, in the year from the foundation of the City 176. Concerning whole conception, we must not let pass that which Plie my writeth in the 36 book after this manner. During the reign of Tarquinius Prifcus, there appeared fuddenly the genitall member of the masculine sex upon the hearth where the fire was kept, & thereupon presently a captive woman and bond-fervant of Tanaquil the Queen, named Ocrifia, fitting there by the fire fide, conceived and was with child; and fo was Servins Tullius born, who succeeded in the kingdom, Afterwards as the boy lay afleep within the KK, palace, his head was feen on a light fire, and supposed he was the son of the familiat Lar of that house. In which regard, he inflitured first the Compitalia and places to the Lars. Concerning his birth, Plutarch hath written more in his book of the Romans fortune. By the crafty and fabrill device of his wives mother Tanaquil, he actained to the Crown in the fourth year of the fift Olympias, and reigned 44 years : but by the villanous complot of Tarquinins his fon in law, and Tullia his own daughter and Tarquins wife, he was moft impionfly flain, in the very ftreet i which thereupon was called Sceleratus, As touching the years of this Kings reign, tome controversie there is amone writers : for Livy, Dia day fins, and Solinus (whom we have followed) write, that he reigned 44 years: but Meffala Corvinus Sex , Ruff us , Entropius , Enfebius , Caffion dorus and Bedas 34 and por above. Howbeit, in adding those ten to the reign of Tarquin af n terwards, they hinder not this gross sum and computation of the years: for they let them down 35, which Livy, Dionyfius, and Solie mus, make but 25. This K. took the name of Servius, by occasion of his own fortune, for that his mother Ocrafia a captive (but a most beam, tifull and wife woman of Corniculum) bare hing during her bondage; but Tulling he was called; by the name of his fathers kindred as Dignyfing writeth in his fourth book, reckoning up many acts by him atchieved.

L. Tarquinius Superbus, the Seventh King of Romans, ruled 25 years.

TN the two hundred and twentieth year after the foundation of the City, L. Tarquinius the younger, having killed Servius Tullius, ensered upon the Roman kingdom with force of arms, nor by Interregent, nor yet any right of law. Superbus he was named for his cruell demeanour, in that he forbad to commit to earth the dead corps of his father in law, by him murdered; giving out that Romulus likewise died and lay unburied. He was the fon of L. Tarquinius Priscus the King ; as Q. Pictor, Au. Gellim, Licinius Macer, Verrius Flacous, and Livins have written. Howbeit, Diony fins out of L. Pifo in his Annals, by most strong reasons disproveth their errour, and by the certain computation of the years shewith how it cannot poffibly be fo but rather that he was the fon of Tarquinius Prifeus his ion, who died in the life of Priscus. Five and twenty years he reigned according to Livy in his first book. Diengin in his fourth, and Solimus in his Polyhistor, Bur Caffiodorm, Eufebius, Eutropius, and Beda afcribe unto him five and thirty years, adding unto his raign those ten years which they took from Servius Tullius, and thereby giving occasion of errour to the later writers. Of him Dionysius, Livy, both the Plinies, Gellius, Macrobius, and Entropius, have written much Collect then, into one fum the year of these Kings reign, and thereof will arise the number of two hundred

His is the second change of the Common-weal, by occasion that Superbus the King, as well for his infolent and proud government, as for the villany offered by Sextus the Kings fon to Lucretia, was expelled, and liberty recovered: wheteupon the loveraign government year by year was committed to two men, who first were named Prators, for that they were set over the people: then Judges, because they decided their controversies: and lastly, Cohinis, in that they advised and provided for the good of the Common-weal: as Cicero in the third book of Laws declareth in these words: Let there be two invested in royall government; and of ruling, judging, and counfell-giving, be they called Prætors, Judges, and Confuls: let them also have the foversignty of command in war. Now the first Consuls or Prators were created by Sp. Lucraint (father of Lucretia, and Interregent for the time) in a generall affembly by the voices of the Conturies, according to the commentaries of Servius Tullius the King. The first Conful had all the right, prerogatives, and regall entigns of the KK, this only provided, that both of them should not have the rods and axes carried before them, for fear of presenting any terrour to the people. Both of them were chosen out of the Patritii: which for this intent l'advertise the Reader of that the progress of the Common-weal might be known; feeing that in process of time they came to be be created out of the Commons allo. Moreover, as concerning the year month, and day, when as the first Consuls entred their government, something were to be said in this place; but because we have spoken before of the variety and diffention of Authors thereabout; therefore letting pass these circumstances, proceed we to the very Consuls, who by the testimony of all writers were first choien a namely,

245 L. Junius Brutus, and L. Tarquinius Collatinus.

Coff, or Prætors of the Roman people: who in the end of the 244 year fince the foundation of the City and upon the first day of March (after the Tarquins KK. the father & the fon were expelled the City) in an affembly of the Centuries were solemnly pronounced and declared Coss. But after that Brutus had compelled his Collegue Tarquinius to refign up his Confulship, either because he was suspected for the affinity and name of the Tarquins (as L. Pifo in Gellius the 15 book and 29 cap. Livy, Plutarch, and Cic. 3. Offic. do write :) or by occasion of a variance between Brutus and Collatinus about the execution of Collatinus his fifters fon, (as Dionyfius reporteth) he subelected in his place Pub. Valerius Volufius the fon of Volufus whose helping hand he had used especially in banishing the KK. Of whose Consulship, Po-

T is recorded by all writers, that L. Junius Isbius in the third book, Dionysius, Livy, Vi-Brut w, and L. Targ. Collatinus, were the first levius Max. 4. book 4. chapter. Plusarchin Pq. licola, and Pliny 36 book, chap. 15. have made mention. But Valerius, after that Brutus in his Magistracy was slain by Aruns the son of Superbus (for the King his father had levied war against the Romans) in a generall Court of all the Centuries, took unto him for his companion in government, Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus the father of Lucretia; and to him (being the elder) submitted the preheminence of foveraignty. And foon after, within few daies upon his death, (for he was very aged) heaflumed anto him M. Horatius Pulvillus for his Collegue in the Confulfhip. The faid Vaccius was called Poplicala, for that during his Magi-Bracy, he enacted certain laws very popular, and namely, concerning the appeal from the Confuls to the people, and the receiving of the flate-government from the faid people, as Livins and Dieny fins do witness. In the vulgar books, as also in the old written Copies (whether by errour or of purpole I wot not Jwe read his name evermore Publicola, but Rillin one and the lame fignification. Only the letters are a little altered, which otherwise have much affinity one with another, as Quintilian writeth, namely o with s, and p with b. For in antique tieles and inicriptions, you shall read often Pobliem for Publicus. To conclude therefore, in the first year after the Kings were exiled, Coss, at Rome were thele, L. Junius Brutus, and Lu. Tar. Collatinus, B. Valerius Publicola, Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus and M. Horatius Pulvillus.

P. Valerius, II. T. Lucretius.
He Confulfhip of these two is recorded unto us by Dionyfins, Livins and Caffiodorus. Onuphrius Panvinius, giveth unto Lucretius the furname of Tricipitinus, both for that it was a peculiar addition to that house; and alfo, because by an ancient Chronologer in the records of Cuspinian, he is named Tricipitinus. Now for Publius the Etymology thereof according to Sextus, is twofold: For some call him Pub, who hath been brought up at the publike charges; others again name him fo, who was a ward before he had his name given him.

P. Luoretius. P. Valerius Poplicola. Ivius calleth this Lucretius by the forename of P. but other books of Titus, Dionyfins writeth, that P. Valerius Roplicola the third time, and Milloratius the second time were Coff. Plut arch speaketh of the third Consulship only of P. Valerius Onuphrius and Sigonius follow Dionyfius. As for Caffiodorus, he leaveth out altogether these Consuls.

Sp. Lartius. T. Herminius.

Feer Poplicola the third time, and Pulvillus the lecond time Confuls, Dionylius hath placed Sp. Larvius and T. Herminius. The same doth Cassiodrus. And the book noted by Cuspinian, under an unknown author, hath in it thus written Poplicola I I I.& Pulvillo; Rufo & Aquilino; Valerio & Tuberto. Livy omitteth these Consuls, and in their place putteth down M. Valerius, and P. Posthumius: But as Sigonisuthinketh, the fault is in the writers of the

But that this year should necessarily come between, Onuphrius thinketh, according to the book of M. Tullius Cicero entituled Brutus: and Certain it is, that Verrius Flaceus in his Capitoline tables hath not rejected these Consuls. Now this name Larrius is derived of Lars, and to ought it to be written, and not Largins, as compely it is to be feen in tome Copies of Livy and Deomfins. As for the furname to Hermini-MI, Onuphrine Supposeth it to have been Esquilines, both for that the mention of that furname appeareth in a fragment of the Capitoline marbles, as also because of what family else it should his grandsire for his father.

be,no writer ever hath delivered. This Sp. Lartius was the brother of Titus Lartius the fitil Dictator, as writeth Diony fins, 249 M. Valerins. P. Postumius. Plutarch, as also Dionysius and Livius Wille teth, that this M. Valerius was brother to M. Valerius Publicola, and therefore truly is he faid to be the fon of Volufus. Postumius for his furname had Tubertus. Witness Zonieras, toge-ther with Plutarch in Poplicola, and Dionyfius in the fift and fixt books. Him Diony fins calleth the brother of Quinties, where he treateth of the Consular Embassadors sent unto the Commons in the year 260. This Peftumius, as Onuphrius teacheth, was by old authors written without the alpiration(b)either because of Postca, Pesturmus, and Postimius, and io Postumius is derived, or for that in old time they wrote umns without the faid (b.) Now is he called Postumini, who was born laft, as Cefellius witnesseth in his commentaries of ancient readings. Howbeit, lawyers pronounce the word with the aspiration, and call by that name him only, who was born after his fathers death: and with them accoid Varro and Platarch in the life of Sylla.

P.Valerius IIII. T. Lucretius.

Donyfius, Livius, Plus arch and (afficadorus, report thele for Coss, this year. But the regifters of Cufpinian deliver unto us Poplicolathe fourth time and Tricipitious Valerius Maximus in the fourth book and fourth chapter writeth thus, Valerius Poplicola began his Confulship with Brutus, and the fameman bare three Confulats afterwards, to the great contentment of 251 Agricpa Menenius. P. Postumius. Dionysius hath for Coss this year, Agripps Menenius Lanatus, and L. Postumius the fecond time. Livy, Caffiodorus, Cufpintans book, and the Greek records disagree not from him. Valerius Max. 4. book, 4. cap. corruptly calleth him M. Menenius Agrippa. Now Agrippa are: they called, who are born into the world with extraordinary throws & birth-travels of their mothers, namely, not with their heads, but their feet forward, against nature.

252 Opiter Virginius. Sp. Coffius. Ivius, Zonaras, and Cassiodorus, name these Confuls barely thus. Diony fins yet is more liberall, calling Sp. Caffins, Ufcellinus and Opiter Virginius, Tricoftus, But whom Dionyfins calleth ioxedivov, Cicero in his Lalius termeth Caffins Becillinus, And Cuspinians Kalender Vifcellinus For first of Vifens cometh Vifcellus, and fo from thence they derive Vifcellinus. Opiter (to note that by the way, as Sex. Pompeius faith) is he, whose father died before his grandsire. And the word foundeth thus much, as if he were born after his fathers death ; or because he taketh

Posthumius Cominius. T. Lartius.

Ivy, Dionysius, Zonarus, and Cassicolorus name these simply thus. But Cuspinians Kalender, giveth to Postiminus the furname Aurineus, & to Lartius Kessus. And those whom Cuspinians book nameth Russii, the Greek registers by another word, but to the same sence, call Flavi.

Ser, Sulpiiuis, M. Tullius.

Loy and Caffodorus allow to these no surnames at all. The Sicilian Records give to Sulpiius the addition of Camerrinus, like as the Kalender of Castinais: and to Tullius of Longus: as also doth Dionysus, who writeth, that Marus Tullius died in the time of his Magitured because the yearwas welnear at an end. Of this M. Tullius. Cicero speaketh in his Bruths, living. As if I should avouch my self to be defended of M. Tullius the Patritian, who in the tenth year after the explosion of the KK, was Cost, with Ser. Sulpiius, This surname Manus, im, flying, As if I should avouch my self to be def ended of M'. Tullius the Patritian, who in the tenth year after the expulsion of the KK. was Cof with Ser Sulpitius. This furname Manius, as Sext. Pempeius faith, cometh hereupon that tome one was born mane, i.e. in the morn, like as Lucius, who entred into the world by daylight, And in another place, this Manius (qd, he) confectated the field Nemorensis, from whom many noble and famous men fprung, and continued many years. Wherupon arose the Proverb, Mu'ii Marii Aricia, i.e. there be many Manii at dric'a, Morcover he was called Servius, who came of parents (either both or one at least) whiles they were inbondage, or elle, who when his mother was dead, lived still in her womb and to was fared.

Tebutius.

Tebutius.

Tebutius.

He forename of this V. tufius or Veturius in fome Copies of Livr, as Marlian sheweth in his annais o: Office Caris: in other Creass: in Caffiodrus, Lore us: in Diom flux Publius: who also surnameth Veturius, Geminus: and T. Ebutius! It liuss and in some place Frank Bay but faultily: for the Latine writers also affirm his surname to be Helua and Geminus. Moreover they that write him Vetufus: initiate the ancient manner of putting Lore. as when they call men Fusis, V. Leii, and Papsis, But they who call him Teturus follow the latter usee. Of this matter Livy speaketh in the year 292.

Q. Cladius, T. Lartius.

Thus fay Livy and Cassionaris: but Dionrsims furnament T. Lartius, Flavus: and Q. (ladius. Signus: to whom accord the registers both of Cussian and Sicily. This T. Lartius is the isme, as appeareth by Dionysius, who before was Cos. and therefore is his surname Flavus rightly added. The house of the Cladia as also of the Juis Serv In Geganis, uniatical Q. cinstiludelicended from the Albans first, as Dionysius writeth.

Au Sempronius M. Minntine.

These Livy and Caffindorus deliver unto us these Cost, But Cuspinians registers and the Stillian, furname them Arrasinus and Augurinus. And Dianysturnament them All Acupyonius Rhatinus, and McMinutius Augurints along the maketh no mention of Augurints, but in the second Consulting of Minutius; Augurints and Stillians and Stillian

Au. Posthumius. T. Verginius.

Hus are these Cost., see down by Dionysus, Livy, and Cassiodorus. And to them verily the greek records put to the surnames of libus and Calimonianus. But the book of Cuspinian adds Registensis & Tricostus besides: so that by him they are thus written, Au. Postbumius Abbus Registensis, and T. Virginius Tricosus Calimonians.

App. Claudius and P. Servilius,

Ivias and Caffiodorus record thefefor Coff. this year. The registers as well of Cuspinian as Sicily, Sabinus and Prifcus: But Dionyfius more fully, App. Cladius Sabinus, and P. Servilius Priscus. This App. Claudius was the top of the Claudian kindred, first named, Athius Claufus, ard afterwards, App. Claudius; who from Regillus, a City of the Sabins (whereupon he was called, Sabinus, Regillenfis) came to Rome in the two hundred and fiftieth year after the foundation of the City, and was ranged among the Patritii, as Livy, Diony fins, and Suctonius in Tiberius make report. This man was grandfire to that App Clandius the Decemvir, As touching his forename there is some difference; whereof ye may fee Onu phrius and Martianus in their Kalenders.

> 260 A. Virginius and T. Vetusius.

These are thusset down by Livy and Cassion writeth them, An Virginius Montanus, and T. Veturius Geminus. The register of Custinian, barely Momanus and Geminus. The Sicilian Cassimontanus and Geminus, Montanus and Casimontanus are both one, Padianus upon the Oration of Cicero for Cornelius, calleth their Consults, An Virginius Tricostus, and L. Vituriu Cicurius: whereby it may be understood, that both of them had two surmanes, to wit, the one, Tricostus, Calimontanus, and the other, Geminus Cicurius; for to elsewhere other witers testific, Custimanus observeth, that this Cicurius; salso called Coturnius by some writers.

Sp. Caffins and Poshbumani Cominius.

Caspinian his books set forth unto us, Vicellinus Kannacas. The Sicilian records, Annancas, and Vicellinus. And that these same were Consuls together in this yeer, and entred upon their government the first of September, sooner then

262 T. Geganius and P. Minutius.

Dissiplies in the beginning of the leventh book nameth for Cost. this year T. Geganius Macerimus, and P. Minustins. The same doth Livius in the second book. Cafisadorus likewise and Europaus. Orofius also in the second book and fift chapter, leaving out one of their furnames. But the Greek records and Cuspinians book surname them both, the one Marcerinus, the other Augurinus. And these are ordinary streames, this so Minusis, and the former to the Greganis.

263 M. Minutius, and An. Sempronius.

O Livy and Cassiodorus set them down, on mitting their furnames, as also the numerall note 11. But Diony flus recorded them sully in this maner, A. Semprenus Assainant the second time, and M. Minutius Augurous like wise the second time. This yeer reckoneth Diony sull to the nineteneth, after that Poplicola the Cos published the law of appealing.

Sp. Nantins and Sext, Furius.

A Fter An. Sempronius and M. Minutius Coss. Dionysius bringeth in to succeed them, Q. Sulpitius Camerinus, and Sp. Larius Flavus the second time. Cusionian registers, Cornutius and Flavus. Moreover, Cornutus is an ordinary surname to the Sulpiti, as may be gathered out of the Capitolior tables of stone. And that these Cosses are not to be left out, either according to the account of the Capitol, or to make up and digest the sum gathered by Varro, appeareth by the Triumph of P. Valerius, which would not fall to the yeer 279, if we should deduct these Cosses, out of the Kaiender.

265 T.Sicinius and C. Aquilius.

N Ext after the former Confals, therefollowed according to Diomyfins, C. Inlins Inlins and P. Pinarius Rafus Convuls. Cuspinian his records deliver untitue. Inlins and Mamercinus: But the Greek, Inlins and Rusus. And that Mamercus is a furname to the Pinarii, appeared by another place. These Confuls Livy over-passeth, like as the other the yeer before z upon whom, they that undertook the explication of the Capitoline tables have noted, that there want Confuls for two yeers. So that of himielf the like may be said to that which he writethin the ninth book of Pife, in this maner [Thele Confuls, Pefo bringerh in immediately after Q. Fabins and P. Desins, leaving out two yeers, whereof we have reported that Claudius and Voluminius were Confuls in theone, and Cornelius with Martius in the other.] Whether he forgat them in the digefting of the Aonals, or of purpose passed by them (notwithstanding he thought of those two couple of Confuls) ic is uncertein. Moreover, the farname of C. Iali-211, Was transformed every where into Tallas and Tulius; but that it is to be read fullius, both Martianus, and also after him Panvinius sheweth. For this furname Iulus is fer from Afcanius the son of Enear, and from the said sutname is derived the denomination of a family; and therefore Virgillaith, Manlins for Confuls. The Greek records. Dame Fabius the fecond time, and Cincinnalis. Cuspinians book hath Vibulanus the second time. The Capitoline stone sheweth, Cn. Manling the ion of Publius.

> C. Horatins. T. Menenius.

"Ivius, Cassiodorus, Diodorus and Dionysius, make report of Cafe Fabius to have been Col, this year with T. Virgenius: but the Sicilian registers, Fabins with Rutilus. Diongfus noteth that Cafe the brother of the Cof, who gave him his place, was a third Conful this yeer, And Livy faith, that I. Virginius Rutilus died in time of the pestilence the 290 yeer.

376 A. Virginius. Sp. Servilius.

A Coording to Livy, Dianylins, and Calliodo. rus, the Confuls this yeer were L. Emplius and C. Servilins: but Diodorns nameth, Lu. E. mylius Mamercus with C. Cornelius Lentulus: the Sicilian registers, Emplins with Esquilinus. Another fragment of the Capitoline stone, only Sernetus Abala: with Efquilinus fubilituted in his room. Moreover, Mamercus (as Sex. Pompeins writeth) is an Ofcane fore name; who also reporteth, the the House Emplia was so called of Mamerous the fon of Pythagorasthe Philosopher, who for his passing courtese was farnamed Emplius.

277 P. Valerius, C. Nautius. Ivius, Caffiodorus, Dionylius, and Diodo-

rus, put down for Coff. T. Menenius and C. Heratius, As for Diodorus, he added unto Horatius the furname of Pulvillius : and the Capitoline ftone furnamethMenenius, Lanatus, And even so both in Cuspinians Kalender and the Sicilian registers, are to be seen Lanatus and Pulvillus Of these Coff, Gellius maketh mention in the 17 book & 12 chap, but not without fault, 278

L. Furius. A. Maulius. Ivius, Caffiodorus, and Dionyfius, fetdowa for Colf. A Virginius and Spurius Servilius. Diodorns, A. Virginius Tricoftus, and C. Servilins Strudlus. In Cufpinian his Kalender, Virginius, for his furname hath Rutilus : and the Capitol m rbles, give Strattus to Serviliar; the Sicilian records have both.

L' & willing Opitor Virgining, or, Popi fene Iuline, Toy and Caffiedorus nominat for this yeers Cols. P. Valerius and C. Nantins. Diony fins, P. Valerius Popicola and C. Nantins. Diedorus P. Valorius Poplicola, and C. Nantins Rufus. The Sicilian registers thus Nausius and Poplicola, Cufpinian, Poplicola and Rufas. The Capitol ftones, having for Rufus, Rutilus : like as Dionyfins before in Largins, for Rafus putteth down Flavas.

Diodorus this yeer nameth Confuls, L. Fuand Caffiedorus record L. Furius and C. Manlins. Diony fins cometh with A. Manlins and Lu. Furius Marlianus giveth warning to tead Vulfo, not Volfe.

App. Claudius Ion of Appins. T. Quintins.

Dionyfins would have L. Emplius Mamerwith Popifcus Inlins : but Livy, L. Emyling and Opiter Virginias. Howbeit he faith that in fome Annals he found Vopifcus Iulius, in stead of Virginias. And them Diodorns, the Greek records, and the avouchers of the Confuls tables within the Capitol, have followed. In the fragments whereof is read lalins, which is a furname of the Inlin. And therefore in the Sicilian registers, it is thus Written, Emplius and Julius: but in those of Cuspinian, Mamerons and Vonisens, Caffiederm hath followed Livy. Moreover, Appins is a peculiar name of the Claudis, which no citizen else of Rome used : because it was a frangers name.

L. Valerius. T. Emplins.

Ivius, Dienyfius, and Caffiederus, name for this yeer Confuls. L. Pinarius and Lu. Furiu. Diodorus, L. Penarius Mamercinus, and P. Furins progentur faultity, as Sigenius and Onnbrins think. Of these Cost. M. Varo maketh mention, and Macrobias in the first book of the Sacurnalia. 282

Loy and Cassiodorus likewile, report for this Lyeer Confuls, Sext. Quintilius and P. Curiatius. Dionysius, Sext. Quintilius and Horatius, Diodorus, Sex. Quintilius Tergeminus. The Capitol stones, name him Sex. Quintilius, son of Sex. nephew of Pub. For this lurname Tergeminus is common both to the Heratii and Curiatii, But Sigenius and Onuphrius allow Horatius tather, Sex. Quintilius fon of Sextus, nephew of Pub.

To this Consul the Greek records give the Luranme of Varus, and so the Capitoline tables of stone do represent him. But Diodorus, Dionfinis, Livy, and Cassiodorus deliver the same man unto us without the surname. Who was his colleague, it is doubtfull. For by Dionfinis it is was P. Heratius: by Livy and Cassiodorus, Pub. Curtatius: by Diodorus, Tergemus; a which is the surname as well of the Carianis, as the Heratii. Onuphrius rather approveth of Carianis.

Decemvire Confular.

I'vy and Diedoris, together with the Capitoline regilters (as far forth as may be gathered by, the broken fragments of the tables them that App Classifier and T. Genetics were Cost, elect for this yeer, but they religiod up the place, in regard of creating Decemvira. Now at touching this Decemvirat, the law Terestia brought it into the commonweal t which law A. Terestim Arfa, a Tribune of the Commons promulged as touching five Quinquevirs to be, created, who should let down laws to gage the Loss authority. For the Commons complained, that their government was too great and tolerable, and therefore required that it might be abated and made more moderat. Which Law after he tou does not in yeep toget potely canvalled by the Trib, to me effect in the end waxed cold again, by reason that the faid Tribiobtained a grant to double their own number. But afterwards upon the occasion that Romulius and Veturius the Coll.bare themselves too extream in rigor against the Com, refusing warfare, the faid is w was fet on foot again, and fuit followed more hotly then before. Whereupon when the LL. of the Senat were doubtfull what to do, at length they relolved upon this point, whereof the principal advicer was T. Romulius) to create certain lawgiver, who should fet down the rights and priviledges both of nobles and commons. And look what ordin nances by them were decreed, the same should bind both the one part and the other. The com, agreed to this determination : and so three Embaffadors, Sp. Postbumius Albas, An Manlins Valfo, and Serv. Sulpitius Camerinas, were fent into Greece, to learn the statuts, customs, rights, and laws of the Athenians and other Cities of Greece, and the fame to being to them to Rome. These went their embassage when Aria wins and Tarpeins were Conful, and three yeers after returned with the faid laws, whiles Softins and Menenius were Confuls. Now when the Tribuns were instant & called hard upon them. to begin once for to make these positive lawes: and now already Ap. Claudius and T. Genuciws were elected coff for this yeer; they patfed an act of the Senat (according to the advice of App. Claudius) That other magistracies should furcease, and to Decemvirsbe created in confular, nay roial authority absolutly, without liberty of appealing from them to the people : who should choose as well out of their own customs and ordinances, as the forrain laws abovefaid, the best & most profitable to the common-weal, and fet down the rights of the people of Rome; And look what they prescribed and presented (if the Senat and people of Rome allowed therof) that should stand in force & bind the whole body of the state for ever. When this act was approved by the Commons, the Confuls refigned and gave over. In whole stead, were chofen Decemvirs confular, namely, Ap. Claudius; T. Genntins, the same that gave up their Confullhip ;) Spur. Posthumius, Serv. Sulpitius, An. Manlius, (those that went in embalsie from the Cols. to Aihens:) T. Romnisus, C. Julius, P. Sestins, Pub. Horatins, all men of confular calling, and such as had been Confuls before. Befides, Sp. Veiurius, according to Livy, Diodorus, and Dionyfius : although Dionyfius called Poftbumius by the name of Publius and not Spurius as Livy, and Diodorns do. Likewife Livy fores nameth Veturius, Lucius ; Diony fins Titus ; but Diodorus and the Capiteline ftones, Spurins. These Decemvirs began their government in the 301 yeer after the foundation of the City, as Livy writeth, and after them Caffioderus goetha But the avouchers of the Capitol records, fay is was the yeer 302;& with them agreeth Solinns, But Varre (who Onuphrins followeth) accounts eth the yeer 303. By this time the Commons, besides that they detested the name of Coss, no less than KK. found no miss of the Tribuns assistance, nor fought once after it, feeing the Decemvirs yeeld one onto another in reciprocal appealing. With great affection therefore and endeavour, as well of nobles as commons, there were created for this year also Decemvirs in Consuls authority absolutly without appeal, Ap. Claudius the second time, Q.Fabim who had been four times Conful, M. Cornelis Maluginensis brother of L. Cornelius, who had been Conful in the year 295; M. Sergius, L. Minutius, T. Antonim Merenda, M. Rabuleius : and three likewise of the Commons, Q. Petilim, K. Duilins, and Sp. Oppius Cornicen, as witneffeth Diodorus , Dionysius, and Livy; although the gentile names for the most part are by Diodorss omitted.

When the more part of the former year was past, and that upon the adding of two other tables to the former ten, there remained no more to do, (in case the said tables were once in the high court and affembly of the Centuries passed) why the common-weal should have any need of the Decemvirs, infomuch as the commons expected, that foon after, the folemn court and affembly aforefaid for creation of Confuls should be published: then the Decemvirs without any word at all made of that election or affembly, came abroad guarded with whole troops of yong gentlemen Patritians, and demeaned themselves more proudly and infolently to every man. But before the year wasfully expired, by occasion of the lecherous luft of Ap, Claudius, who challenged a maiden (one of the commons daughtets) as a bond-fervant, according as Livy more at large writeth; and also of the commons insurrection and departing into the Aventine, the foresaid Decemvirs gave over their Magistracy: and when Q.Furim the high Pontifex called a general affembly of the tribes, ten Tribuns of the Commons were again chosen: and so at length in another affembly of Centuries for the Confuls, holden by the Interregent, created there were Confuls,

L. Valerine Potitus. M. Horatine Barbatus.

These Consuls Onuphrius casteth upon a third year of the Decembers (although Livy seemeth to dissent) to the end that he might jump with the account of the Capitol, which he supposeth to be collected by Varros for by their calculation, the triumphs of these Consuls declared in the Capitol records, are engraven upon this very year, i. 304: 6 as it appears reth evidently, that part of this year was taken up by the Decemvirs, and part by the Confuls. Traciim and Rafar write, that the Decemvirs continued but two years.

Levisus putteth down for Confuls, Sp. Herminus and T. Virginius Calimontanus. Coffiedarus faith, L. Herminius and T. Virginius. Doupfaus writeth adger siguloses, Tiros signius or produced thus, and see siguloses, Tiros signius or signius or thus, and see siguloses, Tiros signius or signius whereby Onupbrius search that it be corruptly written in Diodorus, Structus for Triesfus: for Structus was a surname of the Servilia and not of the Virginii. As for his colleague Herminius, that he is to be sore-named Lari, besides Diodorus and Dionysius, Valerius also sheweth in his tenth book, where he writesh thus: The fore-name of Lars is derived from the Lares.

M.Geganius Macerinus. C. Julius.

These are recorded likewise to be the Confuls this year. The surname Macerinanis suppressed by Cassindarus and Diodorus, whoals to nameth the other L. Julius. In Dionssuccetain pages be wanting in this place, Cuspinias his Kalender hath for Macerinus, Macrinus.

308 T. Quintius Capitolinus IIII. Agrippa Furius;

Diony fins and Livy both, name the Coss, of this year, T. Quintins Capitolinus the fourth time, and Agrippa Furius. Diodorus and Caffedorus Conceal the surname and the numeral note of four. The Greek records have Furius and Capitolinus. Onuphrius unto Furius addeth the surnames of the grandsire, to wit, Medullinus Fusion.

M. Genutius. C. Curtius.

L'ny delivereth unto us for Cost, this yest, M. Genntius, and P. Curiaius, Cassiodorus linguisme, Genstius and P. Curiaius: but Dinguisme, Genstius and C. Quintius: and Dinguishath, M. Genutius and Agrippa Curtiut Chilo. But as Sigonius, and after him, Omphus have noted, it is fally read in Liery, Curusus for Curtius; and that is proved by the authority of Varro de lingualatina: and therefore in the Sicilian registers written they are, Gensius and Curtius.

A Semp. Atratinus. Military Tribuns in Con-Jular authority upon while T. Clelius. Trefignation Confuls were L. Asilius. Gcholen in their room,

L. Papirius Magilanus, L. Sempronius Airatinus,

When C. Canulcius a Tribune of the Commons, had the former year published a fecond second law, That one of the Consuls should be created out of the Commons, (whereby the dignity of the Patritii was empaired) the nobles fearing lest the faid law would pais in deed maugre their heads, drew to a point; whereof C. Claudius made the first motion and was the adviser, That in stead of Consuls there should be created military Tribuns, three of the Patritii, and as many of the Commons; who being endued with Consular authority, should govern the common-weal. Also, that when their years government was expired, the advice both of Senar and also of people should be once again required, Whether they would have Coniuls rather than Tribunes confular? and look which pleased them, they should be created. These points being resolved upon and decreed, three military Tribunes were created only, all Patritii: and well enough were the Commons content therewith , because themselves were eligible and capable of that dignity. Howbeit, this regiment of theirs newly let up, stood not firmly established. For within 3 months after, by a decree of the Augurs, they refigned up their honourable place, as if there had been some error committed in their election: and then T.Quintius Barbatus (nominated Interregent) created Confuls, L. Papyrius Mugillanus, and L. Sempronius Arratinus. The Consuls are left out in the Sicilian registers. Well saith Livy therefore, that these Consuls are found neither in ancient annals and yearly records, nor yet in the Kalender of the Magistrats. But Cicero maketh mention of them in his Epiftle to Papyrius

M.Geganius Macerinus II. T.Quintius Capitolinus.V.

Dionysius and Cassiodorus avouch these for Consults this year. As for Dionysus, he saith that they entred in the month of December. Cassius concealeth both their sunames, and Diodorus the one, namely, Capitolinus. The Greek records have Macrimus the second time, and Capitolinus the site sith time. Zonaras pameth them Macrimus and Barbassis.

312 M.Fab. Vibalanus, Postumus Ebusius Cornicen.

Lin faith, that Confuls of this year, were so named. Diodorus and Cassiodorus are silent in their surnames. The Greek records have Vibulanus and Helua. Diodorus attributes to Ebulius the surname of Sarae, but what manner of addition that might be, Sigonius knoweth not, and thinketh that it should be read, $ $1,000, and thinketh that it should be read, $ $1,000, and

C. Furms Pacilus, M. Papyrius Craffus.

These Consuls by Lion and Cassodorus are in this wise represented unto us. Bur by Diodorus after this sort, Q. Furius Fusius, and Manius Papprius Crassus, And by the Greek resords thus, Pasius and Crassus.

P. Geganius Macrinus. L. Menenius Lanatus.

Livins and Cassiodordus, deliver these Consuls thus fully named, Proculus Geganius Macerinus, and L. Menenius Lanatus, Diodorus, T. Menenius, and Proculus Geganius Macrines. The Sicilian registers, Macerinus and Lanatus.

315 T.Quint. Capitolinus VI. A. Menenius Lanatus.

BY Livy and Caffiodorus, these were the Coninls for this year: but after Diodorus, T. Quintins, and T. Menenius. According to the Sicilian rolls, Menenius and Capitolinus.

Mam. Emylins.

L. Quintius fon of Cincinnatus. Cincin Conf. au-L. Iulius. Cethority.

THe Tribuns of the Commonsimported and prevailed, that there should be an election holden for Tribuns military, rather than Confuls; making no doubt, but in the chufing of fix (for fo many now by law might be created) some of the commoners by making profession that they would be revenged for the death of Melius, would step into the place : howbeit the Commons created no more than three I ribuns with Consular authority, and among them L. Quintius, the son of Cincinnatus. In which election, Mumerius Emplius, a right honorable man and of great worth, was by their fuffrages preferred before Quintins, and Julius they made the third. In like manner, Diodorus nameth three Tribuns military for this year; but in this fort, M. Emylius Mamercus, C. Iulius, and L. Quintius.

317 M. Geganius Macerinus III. L. Sergius Fidenas.

Wy Hen the Commons, together with their Tribuns were quiet, and carefully regarded the main state of the Common-weal, no question there was nor controvers, but that Coss, were shosen, to wit, M. Geganius Macerinus the third time, and L. Sergius, so saith Livivius, Cassodius doth the same, but that he setteth down the names of the Coss, only in this wise, M. Geganius the third time, and L. Sergius, without surnames. Diodorus likewise, M. Geganius and L. Sergius, Cushinians Kalender, and the Sicilian registers, Macerinus and Fidenas. For this Sergius was surnamed Fidenas (as Livy reporteth) by occasion of the war which he made against the Fidenas.

318 M. Cornelius Maluginensis. L. Papirius Crassus.

Loy and Cassiodorus report these above-named, for this year Gonlils. Diodorus nameth them, L. Papirius and A. Corn, Macerinus: but doubtless not without error, as Sigonius supposeth: for bothin, Cuspinians Kalender and the rolls of Sicily, we find Maluginensis and Crassios.

319 C.Inlins II. L. Virginins.

Hele Confuls are found for this yeer in Livy and Coffiedorus ; but in Diederus C. Julius and Procuins Verginius Tricofins, In Cufpinians Kalender and the Sicilian records, Julius and Virginius.

C. Iulius III. or M. Manlius. L. Virginius II. or Q. Martius.

Find in Licinius Macer, that the same Cost. were chosen again for the yeer following, to wit, Inline the third time, and Virginius the fecond Valerius Antias and Quin. Tubero alledg for this yeers Confuls, M. Manlins, and Q. Sulpitins. But in thele to different records of theirs, Tubero and Macer both professe to go by the linnen books; and neither of them diffembleth but that the ancient writers report of military Tribuns that yeer created. As for Licinius, he doubteth not to follow those linen records, and Tubero cannot retolve of the truth. But among other things, which by continuance of time are unknown, this alto is left uncertain. Thus much Livy. But Diodorus in Stead of Confuls, setteth down three military Tribunes, namely, M. Manlins, Q. Sulpitius Pretextatus, and Servius Cornelins Cossus. The Greek records (following Antias and Tubero) have delivered to us Cong fuls, Capitolinus and Camerinus, "Tribunes milita-M. Fabius Vibulanus. Stry in Confuls au-Sergius Fedenas. Marcus Fostins.

The Tribuns of the Commons in their ora-tions continually forbad the the elections of Confuls : and when they had brought it fo about; that the government was at the point of interregency, they wan the maltery in the end, that the military Tribuns might be cholen with Consular authority, But reward of this victory which they shot at, namely, to have a commoner created, they obtained none : for out of the Patritii,namely M. Fabius Vibulanus, M. Fefleus, Ln. Sergius Fidenas. Thus much Livy Diodorns likewise nameth three, but corruptly, to wit,M. Fabins. M oanivios, and L. Servillius. As for Fostins in some of the Capitol monuments, he is writen Flaceinator and not Folius, as in the common editions of Livy, whom Diodorus calleth ourivios.

IN this year hanned the fourth change of the Roman government: for the administration of the weal publike, sell from Tribunes military in contuls authority, to the Tribunes of the commons. The authors that procured this mutation, were (as Lioy reporteth) c. Licinius Stells and L. Sextins, Tribunes of the commons, who in the former year having promulged three laws in favour of the commons and against the power of the Patritii, the first for redsending of debts; a second for a slint of lands and possessions; & the third, that there should be no more elections of Tribunes military, and that one of the consuls should necessarily be chosen a commoner; seeing they could not go through with these laws, by reason of their own fellows oppositions (whom of purpose the Nobles had made for themselves) fell into an anger, and would suffer no enrule Magistrate of State to be created, nor any election to be holden, but only of Adiles and Tribunes, both of commons. This desolate estate andwant of Magistrates (whiles the commons made the fame Tribunes ftill, who with unceffant and invincible perfistance never gave over totros the election of Tribunes ministry) continued in the city for the space of his years, as Live faith. This want of Magiftrates Diodorus calleth draggia, and callette apouthe former year, But Sext . Rufus , Euro , Calfodorus , and Zonaras write that they reled the hate not five years, but four only. Second and Omphrins in his Kalender, tollow Levr, & his Annalsit feemeth that the capitoina writers go by. Pliny alfo in the fixteenth book, and four and fortieth chapter, maketh mencion of the year threehundred seventy nine from the foundation of the city in which year he faith that at Rome

Diedorus nameth them thus, L. Papirius, L. Lichemius, Ser. Cornelius, and Ser. Sulpitius, who writeth also, that after them there was another Anaxchy, and when that was overpass and gone, then were created A. Manlius, L. Farius, Serv. Sulpitius, and Serv. Cornelius. But in his flory, as well through his own default, as the negligence of the writers that copied out same, there is a consusion of yearly Magistrates.

Two Dictators without any curule Magistrats of State besides.

PRefently in the very beginning of the year, they proceeded to put it to the triall of a finall iffue, what should become of the foresaid laws proposed by Licinius and Sextins. When the tribes were called to give their voices, and the publishers of the laws were not hindred by the negatives of their Colleagues coming between; the Nobles began then to quake for fear, and in all hafte betook them to their two last helps and means of refuge, the soveraign and absolute government, and the principal Citizen and greatest man of all others. Resolve they did to nominate a Dictator, and Marcus Furius Camillus was the man; who took unto him for General of the horsemen L. Emplius. But when the Captains and ring-leaders of the Commons dealt very bitterly and roughly against Camillus, he (as Livy writeth) religned up his Dictatorthip, Plutarch also testifieth the fame: who likewile avoucheth the cause thereof, which Livy goeth about to disprove. But both Livy and Plutarch do affirm, that in the room of Camillus thus giving over his place, there was a fecond Dictator created. Livy faith, it was P. Manlius. Plutarch suppresseth his name: but they, agree both, that C. Licinius was the Genestall of the horse, Howheit, they mean not both, one and the felf-same man. For Livy saith and that truly that it was he who had been Tribune military in Confuls authority before: But Plutarch nameth him, who was the author of the fedition and of the new laws: wherein he faulteth. For the Captain of the foresaid sedition, was this year also made Tribune of the Com. the ninth time: but Tribune of the Com, and Generall of the horse at one time he could not be. And therefore Onuphrius thinketh him to have been the fon of P. Licinius Calvus military Tribune, and who had to his grandfather that Pub Licinius who of the Com was the first Tribune military. L. Sextius. L. Emylius.

Hen L. Sextius and C. Licinius, Trib. of the Com now chosen the tenth time. were more and more eager and instant in the publishing of their laws, in the end the authority both of Dictatorand Senat, was conquered by the flrong hand of the Tribunes. For they prevailed not with standing all the Nobility was against it, that there should be holden a solemn affembly for election of Confuls : and that, (by vertue of their laws which they carried clear before them) the one of the Confuls should be a Commoner. By which means, L. Sextius was the first Consul created from our of the Commons. But when the nobles denied flatly to approve the same by their assent, insomuch as the Commons were at the point of infurrection and ready to leave the City: the discord & disfention was at length taken up and appealed by the mediation of the Dictator: and as the nobility was content to yield unto the commonalty a Conful, so the Commons granted unto the pobles one Prator or Lord chief Juffice within the City, and him to be created from out of the Nobility. Granted also unto them now first it was that two Ædiles Curule should be chosen out of the Patritii. The Commons conferred the Confulthip upon L. Sextine (by whose law it was first obtained) and for companion in government he had L. Emylius Mamercus. Thus much Livy and Plutarch: who altogether with Caffiodorus put down for Cost. L. Emylius a Patritian, and L. Sextius a Commoner. The same, Diodorus nameth Lu. Emplius Mamerous, and Lu. Lateranus. Now this Later ranus is the furname of Sextius, as appeareth in a table of record in the Capitoll, wherein the confuls are thus to be feen, Mamercinus & L. Sextius Sextinus Lateranus: as also in the Sicilian registers they are called Mamercinus and Lateranus. In the book entituled De viris Illuftribus of famous men, we find written that it. was not L. These be the Consuls reported by Livy and Cassindary, Diadayus consults of Cassiodorus. Diodorus concealeth their furnames. Valerius Max. in his fecond book and first cha, maketh mention of them, and so doth Plutarch in his problems. But he whom all other writers name Stolo, the Capitoline records nominat Calvus : as also the Sicilian, which deliver their furnames Paticus and Calvus.

L. Emylius Mamercus II. Cn. Genutius.

Toy and Caffiodorus declare these for Coniuls: whom Diodorus in his fixteenth book nameth Cn. Genutius nd L. Emylius. Inthe Capitol tables in this manner they be fet down Mamercinus II. and Cn. Genutius fon of M. and nephew of M. Amentinensis But in the Sicilian registers, Mamercinus and ouna.

C.Sulpitius. C.Licinius Calvus.

"Hese are by Livy recorded Consuls this t year, Caffiodorns writeth them thus, C:Sulpitius II. and C. Licinius. Diodorus in this wife, C. Sulpitius and C. Licinius. Sigonius Supposeth they be the same, who three years before were Collegues. The Sicilian registers give unto Licinus the furname, not of Calvus as before, but of Stolo: and Sulpitius they furname Pations.

C. Pætilius Libo. M. Favins Ambustus.

Livy, and Coffiodorus write the Consuls for this year were, C. Patelius Ballins: and M. Fabius Ambustus. But Diedorus M. Fabius and C. TOTAL GEOFFUPTLY for TOTELS. The Capitoline writers give them furnames divers from Livy: for they call Libo, Vifulus ; but he, Balbus. And the Sicilian registers go with those of the Capitoll.

N this year also, according to Livy, both Coff were Patritii, namely, M. Fabius Ambuffus the third time, with T. Quimius although he writeth, that in some Annals instead of The tus Quintius, he found Marcus Popilius Conful. With Livy accordeth Diodorns, and Caffiodorns Solinus also who in his forty one chapter out of Cornelius Nepos Writeth, that Alexander Was born when M. Fabins Ambuffus, and T. Quise

Oth Confuls created this year were Patri-Dtii, and namely, those who are hereset down, after Livy and Caffiedorus. Diodorus omitteth both their furnames, and also the numeral notes, and fetteth after the former Confuls, M. Valerius and C. Sulpitius.

P. Valerius Poplicola. C. Martins Rutilus.

O L. Valerius Poplicola was given in fellowship of government this year, C. Martius Rutilus of the commons, as Livy faith. These Cassiodorus calleth P. Valerius and C. Martius Rutilus the second time. Diodorus nameth them M. Fabius and P. Valerius. The Sicilian registers intermingle them confusedly with those of the next year, matching Rutilus and Pennus together.

C.Sulpit . Peticus. Tor K.or C. Quint Pennus.

Signius and Onuphrius infert this one year without Confuls, befides the account of the years, according to the Capitoll monuments, albeit they fee neither in Livy, nor inany other, mention thereof; and all to make up the totallfum collected by Varro. And that the said year should at this time especially be interposed, the tables of the Capitoline records do shew. For whereas in them thus engravenit is, M. Valerius Corvus Conful the fourth time in the year of the City 419, and again L. Emplius and C. Plantius, in the year 414: to the end that thele records might agree one with another, of necessity there must be put a year between. For leave out that, then both L. Æmylins the Conful should fall upon the year 414, and the totall sum of the year in Varro and the Capitoline tables be overthrown. That this odd year was now above all other times to be cast between, Gregory Haloander (who left in writing a Chronology of the Confuls) faw long before them: for he over-passed this year wholly, notedwithout Confuls. But Sigonius and Onuphrius are of opinion, that this year there was an Anarchy, and the Common-weal without Confuls, or other Magistrats of state, by occasion of the pestilence, whereof Livy writeth, 425 L. Emylius Mamercinus, C. Plautius.

NExt to them (according to Livy and Gaffie-dorus) were L. Emplius Mamercus, and C. Plantins created Consuls. Diodorus nominateth L. Papyrius with L. Plotius. The Sicilian regiflers, Mamercinus and Decianus. How both these are to be described, their triumphs upon record in the Capitol do evidently shew. These Consuls entred upon their government the first day of July.

Afterwards Curfor turned him out of that Mastership of horse, because withour his warrant he had fought (although it were fortunately) against the Samnits when himself was out of the way and gone to Rome for to take the Auspices anew : and in his room he substituted L. Of these confuls as also of the Caudine peace, Cicero in his book of old age; Pliny also in his book of samous men, Gellius in his 17 book and 21 chap. Florus in his 17 book and 15 chap, and Ordsus in his 3 book and 15 chap, and Ordsus in his 3 book and 15 chap, do make mention.

434 L. Papyrius Cursor II. C. Publidius Philo.

L Joy and Cassiodorus shew for this years Consuls, Q. Publilius Philo and L. Papprius Cursor, the second time. The Sicilian registers, Cursor and Philo. But that this Philo should now be third time Consul, his Consulships do plainly shew.

435 L. Papyrius Curfor, or Mugillanus. Q. Anlius Corretanus II.

L Pappins Curfor were this year created Conful the third time, with Q. Amylins Ceretanus the Geodesia and for his good fervice in war at Luceria, continued fill in government: or rather L. Pappins Mugillanus, and for the furname was mittaken. Caffiedorus delivereth unto us L. Pappins and Q. Anlins Cerretanus. The Sicilian regilters, Pappins and Cerretanus. The monument of his triumph in the Capitoll, alloweth of curfor and not Mugillanus. The author of that book which Cuffinian hath fet forth, following other Annals, tetteth down Mugillanus.

M.Foslius Flaccinator, L.Plantius Venno.

Sheing that for twelve years next enfuing, we have the Capitoline tables whole and found, the lefs trouble we need to be at in reforming and redrefting the names of the Magiltrats. Both they, and allo Liev with Caffiodorus represent unto us for this years Confuls, M. Folius Flaccinator and L. Plantius Venno. Diodorus calletthem. L. Platius and pub @ of Alio. The Sicilian regifices, Venno and Flaccus.

C. Junius Bubulcus. Q. Emplius Barbula.

Affiodorus putteth down c. Junius and Quintus Emplius for Confuls. Livy, c. Junius Bubuloss, and Quintus Emplius Barbula, A flone in the Capitoll, Q. Emplius Barbula, and C. Junius Bubulcus Brutus.

Sp. Nantius. M. Popilius.

NExt follow in order Sp. Nautius and M. Papilius Confuls, according to Livy and Caffiodorus, Ruillus and Lana their furnames, are by Sigonius reflored unto them: and the fame also are to befeen in the Sicilian books of record.

L.Papyrius Curfor IIII. Q. Publins Philo IIII.

The Confuls names of this year, through the default of the writers that copied forth Livies books, are there left out: namely, L.P.a. privas Carfor the fourth time, and L. Pathlini Philo likewife the fourth time: as it is written in caffiodorus, in the Capitoll tables, and in cuffinians book, wherein they are named curfor and Philo. How bette, in the Sicilian regilters they are called curfor and Lense.

440 M.Pætelins, C. Sulpitius,

Loy and Caffiodorus report for Confusthin year C. Sulprius and M. Parielius. But Diadrus hath C. Sulprius and μαξειθ πόπωθ corruptly for ποτπία. Τhe Capitoline writers, have M. Pætelius Libo and C. Sulprius Longus the third time. The Sicilian registers, Longus and σαμνίτι.

441 L.Papirius Cursar.V. C. Junius Bubulcus.

Diodorus putteth down for Confuls this year L. Papirius fift time, and C. Junius, The Sicilian registers, Curfor and Bubuleus, But Lity and c. afficadorus, L. Papirius Curfor V. and C. Junius Bubuleus II. Feftus maketh mention also of these Cossi, in his 18 book,

M.Valerius. C.Decius,

Lay writeth that there followed confuls MValerius Max. and P. Decius: but Caffiodorus, faith M. Valerius and P. Decius: but Caffion in his book of water-conduits, speaketh of these Confuls; whom he writeth to have ben thirty years after the beginning of the Samits war. As for P. Decius, Lievy afterwards called Mus. The Sicilian registers have Max, and Mus.

C. Junius Bubulcus III. Q. Emylius Barbula, II.

VVE find in Livy for Confuls this year, C. Junius Bubulcus the third time, and Q. Emylius Barbula the fecond time: likewife in Caffiodorus, But Diodorus nameth them C. Junius and Q. Emylius. In the sicilian regifects, Bubulcus and Barbula, The same names are also in the Capitoll monuments, which be in Livy.

C.Martius Rutilius. Q.Fabins.

CAins Martins Rusins and Q. Fabius behis
Years Confuls in Livy, But in Caffiedams, C.
Martins Rusins and Q. Fabius the secondime.
Diederus hath C. Martins and Q. Fabius the second time. The Sicilian registers show Rusin

445 A year without Confuls. P. Papirius Distator. II.

7 Errius Flaccus interposeth this year also without Confuls, wherein he reporteth L. Papirius Dictator the 2 time, with C. Junius Bubuleus Brutus the Master of the horie. This year Diodorus, Livy, the Greek records, Cufpimans book and Caffiodorus do overleap, For Livy writeth that L. Papirius Curfor was nominated by the conful Dictator, and by him C. Tunius Bubulcus named Master of the horse: upon occasion that C. Martius the Cof. had no good fortune in his conduct of the wars in Samnium. This inferting of one year Onuphrius hath approved, that the computation of the years gathered by Varro might stand in force, which to the Capitoll tables putteth one year, whose judgment we also are willing to follow.

> 446 Q.Fabins. P.Decins.

Livy writeth, that Fabius continued Conful this year allo, for his fingular good fervice in fubdung and taming Herruria: and that he had for his companion in government Decius. Caffiodorus acknowledgeth for Coss. Q. Fabius the third time, and P. Decius the second time, Diodorus, P. Decius and Q. Fabius. The Sicilian registers Mus and Rullur. The Capitoline sables, P. Decius Mus II. and Q. Fabius Mus., Rullianus the third time,

App.Claudius. L.Volumnius.

Ley faith, that immediatly there followed Confuls, App, Claidins and L. Volumnius. Confindorus and Diodorus, Appius and Violent, The Sicilian regifiers, App, Claidins Cacui, and L. Volumnius. The Capitoline monuments have Flamma and Violent, Now whether one of the Confuls furnames be Violens or Violentis, Omphrius advertifeth us to confider, Forthe capitoll floor hath it alwaies written Violens. But the Greek words have Appius and Bionhard. as if the name were Violentis.

448 Q. Martius Tremulus, P. Cornelius Arvina.

Ley and Cassiodorus regular for the Consuls of this year, Q. Martius Tremulus, with a Collegue adjoyned unto him Diodorus saith Q. Martius and P. Cornelius. The Sicilian records, Tremulus and Arvina.

L. Posthumius. T. Minutius
Licius Posthumius and T. Minutius accreported Consuls by Diodorus, Livy and Cassido.

Cushinians book sheweth, Megellus and Augus rinus. Thefe Coff. doth L. Pife put down forto fucceed Q. Fabius and P. Decius, leaving out those two years wherein we have set down(as Livy writeth) that Claudius with Volumnius, and Cornelius with Martius were confuls, Whether his memory failed him in digefting of the annals, or of purpose he supposed that those two couple of Consuls were not truly recorded, and therefore overleapt them, I know not. A fragment there is of the Capitoline Rone, which shewerh for this year, Megellus to be the furname of Posthumius, Tiberius the forename of Minutius, and M. of Fulvius. Now the furnames of Fulvius were Curvus and Petinus, as it appeareth written in his triumph,

P.Sempronius Sophus. P. Sulpitius Saverrio.

The Confuls next following were P. Sulpid Itims Saverrio, and PaSempronius Sophus, according to Livy and Caffiedorus. In Diodorus they are written P. Sulpinius and P. Sempronius, and Saver rio. Pluy written of these Confuls in his 33 book: but Sempronius he calleth Longus, Both of them are described thus by their triumphs, appearing upon record in the Capitoll, for in their Confulship there is no more to be seen but Sophus and Publius.

L.Genutius. Ser. Cornclinus.

Diodorus, Livy and Caffiodorus reportion Cossa, this year, L. Genutius, and Servius Cornelisus, The Sicilian registers have Aventinensis and Lenulus. The Capitoline writers put unto Cornilus the iurname of Lenulus.

M. Livius Denter. M. Emylius.

Ivy nameth for Consuls this year M. Livius and c Emylius. Cassiodorus, M. Livius and L. Empleus Diedorus, M. Livins and M. Emplius. As for the forename to Emilius, Sigonius and Onuphrius do think that more credit is to given unto Diodorus, than others : especially, feeing that in Livy there is mention made the year following of M. Emplius Paulus Generall of the horsemen, whom they all think to be the same man that this Conful. M. Livius is written Denter in the Capitoll records, which furname Livy in another place addeth to the Livii. Cuspinians book in like manner setteth down Denter and Pantus as the furnames of these Consuls. The Sicilian registers, Denter and Emylius.

Two Distators, and no conful.

This year also of two Dictators without Consuls, Onupbrius inferrest in his Kalender, howbeit directed thereto by evidence of the Capitoll fragments: to the end that the calculation of Varro might agree in all respects which which, fthis year were over-slipped should be wholly overthrown: although Diodore, Livy, and Caffiodore diffent therefrom, and leave out this year altogether. Whereof see Onuphrius more at large in his Kalender uponthis year

M.Valerius. Q. Apulcius Pansa.

T Mmediatly after M. Livius and M. Emyli-Ins, Livy, and Caffiodorus letterh pass the year of two Dictators without Confuls bring in M. Valerius and Q. Apuleius Pansa for Consuls. The Greek records shew Corvinus and Pansa. It feemeth that Livy by Marcus Valerius meaneth Maximus, for that he faith that prefently upon his Dictatorship he was made Col. Now that M.r. Valerius Max. was Dictator the year before he writeth plainly.

M.Fulvius Patus, T. Manlins Torquatus.

Lyear, M. Fulvius Paras and T. Manlius Torquarus. The Sicilian registers have Pætinus and Torquetus, Livy faith that Q. Fabius refused the Consulship offered unto him without any suit of his. But T. Manlius the Conful, was by lot appointed to levy war against Hetruria, which took arms and prepared for war against the truce accorded upon. Now was he scarce well entred into the enemies confines, but as he exercifed among men of arms, and chanced to turn about his horse upon a full carrier, he was caft from his back: whereupon (for the prefent) he lay for dead, and within three daies after the and Caffiodorus write. In the Sicilian records, faid fall ended his life. Then all the Centuries in general by their suffrages chose M. Valerius Col, whom the Senat purposed to have made Dictator. Thus much Livy. By M. Valerius he meancth Corvus, whom Cicero writeth in his book of old age, and Valerius Max. in his 7 book and 48 thap, to have been Cof, now the fixt time, and that between this and the first there were 46 years, although Plutarch in the life of C. Marius faith they were but 45. Howbeit all of them call him Corvinus and not Cor-

456 L.Corn: lius Scipio. Cn. Fulvius.

Nens Fulvius and L. Cornelius Scipio are re-Corded Confuls by Livy and Caffiodorus: but Scipe and Centumalus, by Cuspinians book: Scipe and Maximus by the Greek records.

Q. Fabius Max. IV. P. Decius Mus III.

L soy and Cassiodorus alledge for Coss. this year, Q. Fabius Max, the fourth time, and P. Decius Mus thrice. The fame Coff. Cufpinians book and the Greek records delivered unto us. The author that writeth of famous men, and Frontinus in his book of Stratagems, speak of P. Decius thrice Conful.

458 L. Volumnius. Appius Claudius

Ucinus Volumnius a Commoner, and Apping Claudius of noble bloud, were created Coff. this year : even the fame men who in their former Confulthip were matched together, as Live and Cassiodorus write: but in the Sicilian regiflers they are found written, Claudius and Violens. Howbeit, Cicero in his book entituled Catoreporteth, that between the two Contuithips of App. Cacus were ten years.

O. Fabius V. P. Decius IV.

I Ivy and caffiodorus both witness, that the Coff next following, were Q. Fabins the fift time, and P. Decius the 4 time, who had been companions together already in 2 Confulats and in one Cenforship. The Sicilian registers have Rullus and Mus : of which Confuls Cicero speaketh very often : Valer. Max, likewise, Paterculus also, Platarch, Frontinus in his book of Stratagems, the author of the book of famous men, Eutropius, Orofius, and others : who all report, that the Cof, P. Decius, following theexample of his father, offered himself to die for the Roman legions, and by his death purchased a notable victory to the people of Rome.

L. Postumius Megellus. M. Atilius Regulus.

THe Coff, next following, were L. Postumius Megellus, and M. Atilius Regulus, as Livy their furnames are Megellus and Regulus,

L: Papirius Curfor. Sp.Carvilius.

Fter Livy and Caffiodorus, the Coil. this Year were L. Papirius Curfor and Sp. Carvilins. After the Sicilian registers, Curfor & Max. A stone in the Capitol maketh mention of Papirius the fon of L, nephew of P, furnamed Curfor, whom Livy writerh to be the fon of Papirini 5 times Cof. Of thefe Coff. Pliny of Verona maketh mention in his 7 book and 60 chap. Val. Max. likewise in his 7 book and 1 chap Velleins in his 2 book : and the same Livy in the year 456.

Q. Fabius Gurges Max. Decius Junius Brutus, fon of Scavalini.

The year following had Confuls, Q. Fabins Gurges, and D. Junius Brutus Scava, as willnels Livy and Caffiodorus Zonaras nameth them, Junius Brutus and Q. Fabius Max, Cufinians Kalender, Maximus and Scava. The Sicilian regifters, Brutus and Maximus, Livy, Pliny in his 7 book, the Capitoll tables, and Zonaras, have delivered, that this Fabius was the fon of Q. Max. Rullianus, who had been 5 times Cof, before, And here an end of the Confuls for the first 10

463 L. Posthumius. C. Junius.

Since that after this Consulship, ten books of Livy next ensuing be lost, whom hitherto we have had for the most sufficient witness of this ftory; to as now we are in manner deftitute and deprived of the best helps of Annals, namely, Diodorus, Dionysius, and Liey: from hence forward we will use principally in digetting and reckoning the years by the Confuls, the authority and teltimony of Caffiodorus, the Sicilian records, and Cuspinians book: yet will we not in the mean while reject what help soever shall be ministred unto us by others. For this year therefore Caffiodorus writeth, that L. Postumius and C. Junius, were created Coss. whose furnames, Megellus, and Brutus Bubulcus, have not been left out so much as in Cuspinians Kalender, nor in the Sicilian records, Livy also maketh mention of them in his 28 book, faying thus, Lu. Postumius Megellus the Interregent, was createdCof, with C. Bubalcus, by that very court. and affembly which himfelf called and held.

P.Cornelius Rufinus. M'. Curius Dentatus

The Cost, this year are recorded by Cassiods-rus, Pub. Cornelius Rusinus, and M', Curius Dentatus: for whom in the Sicilian registers, appear Maximus the third time, and Mus the fixt time. But of those forenamed Cost, Cicero maketh mention in his book, entituled Cato; Paterculus in his first book, Valerius Max, in his fixt book, and 3 chap. Pliny also in his 7 book and 50 chap. Now this M'. Curius was called Dent atus, as Pliny Writeth in his 6 book and 16 chap, for that he came into the world with teeth.

M.Valerius. Q.Caditius.

Marcus Valerius and Q. Caditius were after-wards Cost, as faith Cassiodorus. The old book of Cufpinian putteth to them the furnames of Corvinus and Nottua: which in the Sicilian registers are overpassed. The Greek records shew unto us, Maximus and Mus: for Maximus was a furname also of the Valerii Corvini.

Q. Martins. P. Cornelius.

Affiodorus this year delivereth for Confuls, Q. Martius and P. Cornelius, Cufpinians book and the Greek records add their furnames. Tremulus II. and Arvinus II. who had been Coninis together once before.

M.Marcellus. Sp. Nautius.

Affiodorus avoucheth Confuls this year, M. Marcellus and Cn. Nautins. The Greek records and Cufpinians book, have Marcellus and Rutilus.

M. Valerius. C. Elius.

Marcus Valerius and C. Alius are ranged in this year for Cost by Cost odorus Custin nians book putterh forth, Maximus and Pains but the Greek records, Potitus and Patus. Nove vou must think, that both Maximus and Potitus are the furnames of the Valerit,

C.Claudius. M. Emylius.

Or this years Cosi. Cassiodorus hath C.Cliu-I diusand M. Emplius. The Greek records and Cuspinians book, Canina & Lepidus: whereof the former is the inrname of Claudius, the latter of Emplius.

470 C. Servilius. L. Cacilius.

Dy Caffiodorus, C. Servilius and L. Cacilius Metellus are placed Coff, in this year : for whereas in some copies of Caffindorus, instead of Lu. Casilius, is written Calius that is a fault; as Sigonius and Onuphrius have noted. To Servilius this Conful, the Greek records add the inrname of Times, whom they put down Col. with Dente, they would tay Denter, as both Sigonius and Onuphrius Suppose. For Denter is a furname also given to the Caciling as appeareth

P.Cornelius Dolabella. Ca. Domitius.

Affiodorus interreth P. Corn. Dolabella, and Cn. Domitius for Cost. Cuspinians Kalender hath Dolabella and Calvus. The Sicilian regiflers, Dolabella Maximus. And some think that Maximus was the furname of Dolabella, which he seemeth to have acquired by the honour that he had won in the war against the Gauls.

C.F. bricius, Q. Emylius

Assinderus bringeth in for Coss.C. Fabrici-us and Q. Emylius: but the Sicilian regiflers, Lufcinus and Fabus. Of them Cleero in his book Lehus, maketh mention in this manner : We see that Papus Emylius was familiarly act quainted with C. Luscinus; for so we have heard our fathers tay that they were two Coil. together, and companions in the cenforship. Moreover, Palerius in his chap, where he treateth of Poverty, maketh mention of c. Fabricius, and Q. Emylius Papis. This Emylius, Plus tarch in his Parallels calleth corruptly by the name of Paulus

L. Emylius. Q. Martius.

—Here followed cost as cassiodorus shew-L eth, L. Emylius & Q. Martius; unto whom Culpinians book and the Greek records give alfo their furnames, Barbul and Philippus: and the same also is evident by the records in the Capitoll of their triumphs. 474

P.Valerius. T.Coruncanius.

Phb. Valerim and Tit. Coruncanius are by Caffiedorus placed in this year for Coss. The Greek records, Cuspinians book, Florus, Orosius, and Evinus. By Give to Valerius the surname of Lavinus. And Plutarch hath answer for naisi-

475 P. Sulpitius. P. Decius.

NExt after those, Cassiodorus putteth down P, Sulpitius Consul with P, Decius. The Sicilian registers, have Savennio and Mus. Cicero in his 2 book, entituded De Fin, and in his Tuculan disputations, saith, That this Pub. Decius was the ion of that P, Decius who vowed himfelf to death in the Samnits and Gauls war.

476 C.Fabricius. Q. Aemylius.

Affiodorus delivereth unto us for Consuls C. Fabricius and Q. Aemilius: whom Cufpinians book and the Greek records, all Lustivisthe second time, and Papur. That these were fellows together once before in the Consulat, Cicero writeth in his book Laius, Plutarch in Pyrrhus, Gelli, 112 3 book, chap. 8. Entropius, and Zonarus, make report of the same.

P.Cornelius. C.Junius.

Pub Cornelius, and C. Junius, are rehearled for Confuls this year by Cassiodorus, Cuspinians book hath Rusinus the second time, and Bruss. The Greek records, Rusinus and Butuleus, Zonarus hath Rusinus & Junius, Of P. Rusinus twice Cos (Cic., in his 2, book of a perfect Orator Valer, Max, in his 3, book, and 4, chap. Gellius in his 4 book, and 8 chap, in his 17 book likewise and 21 chap, and last of all, Frontinus in his book of Stratagems, make mention.

478 Q Fabius. C. Genutius.

Affied rus reporteth Q. Fabius and C. Gemuins Confols. The Sicilians regilters have Gurges and Clepfies. Of these Cost. Orofius maketh mention in this wife: When Fabius Gurges was the second time Cos, with C. Gemutius Clepfina, a grievous pessilence reigned both in the City, and also in the territory about it,

> 479 M'. Curius, L. Lentulus,

Assistance and Eutropius deliver unto us for Cosl. M'. Curius and L. Lentulus. The Sicilian registers, Dentatus and Lentulus. This is the third Consulas of M'. Curius, which together with Lentulus Consulthip, is drawnout of the Capitoll records of triumph this year.

480 Serv. Cornelius. M. Curius.

Affiodorus sheweth for this years Con Servins Cornelius and M. Curius Cuffinians book and the Greek records, Merendage Dentatus the third time. This M'Curius is now Cos, the fourth time, for third the was before. Concerning this Serv. Cornelius Merendage limp relateth and writeth, that he received a pincely cornet of gold at the hands of L. Lentilus the Cos, of the former year, for winning a town of the Sammits.

481 C.Fabricius. C.Claudius.

Assistance of the Assistance of the Scalins of Canadius Confuls: the Sicilian records, Licenius and Canina: Cassinians Kalender, Licinius and Cinna, Eutropius, Fabius Licinius and Cinna, Eutropius, Fabius Dorfo and Claudius Canina. Whereby it may be understood, that these Consistance case of Cabius Dorfo Licinius, and Caius Claudius Canina: for Dorfo was an old name of the Fabii.

482 L. Papirius Curfor. Sp. Carvilius.

NExt after them, Cassiodorus nominateth for Cost, Sp. Carvilius and Lu., Papiriss Cursor. The records both of Sicily and Cuspinian, have Cursor and Maximus. Both these were now Coss, the second time as appeareth by their triumphs upon record in the Capitoll. Frontinus speaketh of them in his book Of water-conduits, and Livy in his 24 book, 483 C.Quintius. L. Genutius.

T is reported by Caffiodore, that C. Quintim and L. Ganusus were Confuls. Calpinian book and the Greek records, fet to their furnames, Claudius and Clepfina, Livy in his 7 book fpeaketh of one Tit. Quintius lame of oneleg, from whom haply this furname is drawn,

C. Genutius. Cn. Cornelius.

REported there are for Consuls this year by Cassiodorus, C. Genutius and C. Constitus; whole surnames were Clepsina and Blasso, as it appeareth in Cussinas book, This Casius Generius; is the same, who before-time was Consul, As for C. Blasso, he is described by his Centership standing upon record in the Capitoll, The Greek records over-pais them both.

P. Sempronius. 3 or after $ Q. Ogulphius. App. Claudius. 5 fome, $ Fabius Pittor.

A Free Cornelius and Genutius Consuls, Caffiedorus bringeth in Pub. Sempronius, Avo.

App. Claudine, and of purpose over-skippeth Q. Gulo and Fabine Pictor. Zonaras, Q. Gallus and C. Fabin. Of them speaketh Entroping, saying:When Q. Gulo and Fabius Piltor were Confuls, the Picenats raised war; and by the Confuls next following, to wit, P. Sempronius and App. Claudius, they were vanquished. Pliny alfo in his 33 book and 3 chap. When Q. Fabius (quoth he) was Conful, filver was coined and stamped for money, five years before the [fecond Punick war. Thefe Confuls, Velleim alfo reckoneth in his first book. But Sigonius and Onuphrius advertise us, that the book of Entropine is very faulty in one of these Consuls, and that in lieu of Quin. Gulo, it should be read Q. Ogulphius: for of this Gulo, there is in no place besides, any mention: so as they would have, that it should be Q. Ogulvius, son of L. nephew of A, furnamed Gallus, who a little before was fent in embassage to Ptolomens. And it falleth out passing well, that they should match Ogulvius a commoner, with Fabins a Patritian. Alfo Onuphrius testifieth, that in the most ancient hand-written books of Eutropius, the name is found of Ogulvine. And, as both the Greek records, and also Zonaras, together with the more ancient and perfect copies of Europius, agree to this his judgment: so Hubertus Golizius likewise in his Catalogue of Consuls, embraceth the same : and that which maketh most for the purpose, the old antiquities of coin witnels as much. But in the mean while this is worth the observation, that oftentimes in the most ancient pieces of money, the letter C is written for G: as for example here, Ocul. Cal. for Qgul, Galba.

P. Sempronius. App. Claudius.

Eeing that we fettle the Confulship of the Stormer year, in Ogulvius and Fabius Pictor, and that upon the authority of Eutropius, the Greek records, Cuspinian, Zonaras, Onuphrius, and others; we will fet down for this years Comfuls, P. Sempronius and App. Claudius, whom Velleius in his fifth book calleth, Sempronius Sophus, and Appius the son of Cacus. The Greek records, Sempronius Rufus Sophus: and Cuspinians book Rufus. Moreover, this also Golezius giveth us to understand, that the surname of this Sempronius is in old peeces of coin found written without an aspiration [Sopus;] which is no rate thing to be seen in such antiquities: for we read in others of them, Philippus, Tampilus, Graccus, Pulcer, Triumpus, for Philippus, Tamphilus, Gracchus, Pulcher, Trinmphus, and fuch like.

M. Astilius. 487 L. Julius Libo.

Europius pittech down for Confuls, M. Attiline and L. Julius Labo. The Sicilian regifters, Regulas and Lipo. Coffindorus, M. Attilius and Libulius. And both of shem are taken forth of the fecords of capitol triumphs; D. Iunius. 488 N. Fabius.

Affiodorus reporteth for Coss, this year, D:
Junius and N.F. abius: the Sicilian register; Pera and Pittor: the capitol records of triumphis, D. Junius son of D. nephew of D. surnamed Pera, and N. Fabius son of C. nephew of
M. surnamed Pittor. Ilpon what occasion these Fabit took the surname of Pittor, Pliny sheweth in his 35 book chap. 4. Valer, Max. in his 4 book and 3 chap, seemeth to note and signify; that Fabius Gurges and N. Fab, Pittor, lived at one and the same time.

Q. Fabius Mavimus. L. Mamilius Vitulus.

This year also Cassiodorus passeth over. The Greek records shew, Maximus and Vitulus, Zonarus, Q. Fabius, and Emplias (no doubt) for Mamilius, by some error and sault of the copies. Cuspinian out of some old books delivereth unto us for Contolls, Q. Fab, Maximus and Lu., Mamilius, Onuphrius thinketh, that Q. Fab, Maximus Gurges was now thrice Consul.

Ap. Claudius. M.Fulvins.

Besides the capitol monuments, Polybius in his fifth book maketh mention of these Consuls, Gellius also, who calleth them thus, App. Claudius brother of Caesus surnamed Caudex, and Mar. Fulvius Flaceus. In like manner Livy, Paterculus, and Pliny in his book of samous mens as also Appianus, Florus, Frontinus in his I book of Stratagems, Eutropius, Orosius, and Cassicodorus.

M'.Valerius. M'.Otacilius.

Afflodorus and Eutropius shew unto us, that

Zonaras nameth Valerius Max. and Oracilius

Crassus. Cuspinians Kalender and the Sicilian records, Max. Messala and Crassus. Of these Consuls Yer. Flaccus, Palpins, Cassodorus, Eutropius, and Macrobius out of Varro make report.

As for Macrobius, he rendreth a reason, why
M. Velerius was in this government of his named Messalas and Pliny likewise, in his sixt book and five and thirtieth chapter.

L. Posthumius. Q. Mamilius.

Affiedorus and Potybius put down for next Confuls, L. Poftumius and Q. Mamilius; Zonaran nameth them, Poftumius and Albims and Qaimus Mamilius; The Sicilian registers, Albims and Vitulus: but the capicolmonuments, L. Poftumius Ion of Lucius, nephew of Lucius, inchew of M. furnamed Megellus, and Q. Mamilius fon of Quenchew of M. furnamed Finulus.

493 L.Valerius.

T.Otacilius.

Polybim and Cassiodorus match together in the Consulat for this year L. V. uci mand T.Oracilius : the jurname of V. derius is I lace s, and of Otacilius, Graffus, as it appeareth upon the capitol and Sicilan records.

Gn Cornelius C. Duilius.

Affindorus and Zonaras bring in for Cost. Cn, Cornel us and C. Duilius. In like manner also Polybius, but only that in lieu of Jul-AIG he hath ABIG. The Sicilian Registers thew Scipio and Dadius. Cn. Cornelius Scipio is furnamed also Afina, by the capital writers Orofin, Entropius, and Valerius in his fixt book chap. to. of which furname Macrobius writeth thus in his first book of Saturnalia: The surname of Afria (qd, he) was given to the Cornelis, for that the first of the House Co: nelia having eicher bought land, or given his daughter in marriage, when (after the lolemn manner) he was required to put in good furcties for fecurity, brought into the open market place a the als laden with money, and pawned down that prefently in Head of pledges.

495 C. Aquilius fon of M. L. Cornelius fon of L.

Here are nominated by Coffiedorus for 1 Confuls, C. Aquilius and L. Cornelius. The Sicilian registers, Florus and Scipio. Zonaras, C. Florus and L. Scipio. Entropius and Orofius, L. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Aq ilius Florus, Polib.m leaveth them out. The Capitoline monuments agree with the Annals of Entropius and Orofin .

A. Avilius Colatinus, Q. St. Ipitim.

Polybics arousheth for this years Confuls, A. Arkus and C.S Ipries. Coffedor s, A. Arth & C. Latinus, and C. Sulpitius. The Sicilian Registers and Cusp nians Kalender, Calwinus and Patercul s. The capito: monuments, A. Atilus Clain s and C. S Ipitius Pairculus, Zonards Actives Calatinus, and Cains Sulpitius. Of these Confuls, Pelibius Cicero, Velerius, Flores, Frontinus in his Strategems, Flore the yonger Gellies, Eutropius, and Caffindorus make m ntion. But concerning the forename of Seintins Patereules, the Capitoline tables difagree one from another; to wir, those that carry the records of the triumphs, from those that thew the Confulthips and other magifiracies; for in their latter monuments he is called Quintus in the former Cains. Whereby Goltzius dorh conjecture that one man was nor the author of both those records, namely, the Triumphal and the Confular.

Cn. Cornclins.

Affiodorus fineweth unto us, Cn. Cornelius and L'. Atilius Serranis, for Confuls: but Polybixs, C. Aulius. The capitol tables, C. Arilius Regulus. Cuspinians Kalender and the Sicilian registers, have Regulas and Blato the econd time. But how Arthus should come by his jurname Serrenus, Play theweth in his 18 book. faving; In these daies the fields were tilled by the very hands of L. Generals themselves and a man verily would believe thereby, that the ground joyed in a laureat plough-ik re and a triumphant plowman. Him they found a low. ing, unto him they presented those honorable dignities, and so took he his furname Serranus. As concerning Blafio, all authors well neer befides, approve the judgment of Cuspinian: but Goltzius supposeth, that he was northesame man that was Conful before; and therefore he writerh him the fon of C, nephew of L, without putting to the numeral note II.

Q. Caditius. L. Manlius.

THe next Confuls that fucceeded, were (by Caffiedorus his taying) Q. Caditius and L. Manlies. The Sicilian registers name them, Vulfo and Caditius. Zonaras, M. Regulus and L. Maalius, Europius, M. Atilius Regulus and L. Manlins Villo: and Polybins, M. Atilim and L. Manlius, Insenus in his 41 book maketh mention of these Consuls. But ye must understand, that Q. Caditius died whiles he was in office, and M. Atilius was substituted inhis room and made Consul the second time; as appeareth evidently by the capitol tables, wherein itstandeth thus upon record, Lu. Manlius Vulfo Longis : and in flead of Q. Caditius M. Atilies Regul is the fecond time: as also by Cufpinians book, wherein is written, Longus and Regulus.

M. Emylius Paulus. Ser. Fulvius Nobilior.

DOlybins the weth for the Coff, this year, Ser. Fulvius, and M. Aemyli s. Cufpin ins Kuchder, Not illor and P. v. lus. The Sichian regifters, Patinus and Pales. C fi dorus and E tropius together with the Capitaline records have Ser. Fulvius Noblin, and M. Emplius Paulus.

> 500 Cn. Cornelius. A. Atilius.

Affindorus and Polybins report for this years Confuls, Cn. Cornelin, and A. Atilius. The capitol authors write, A.At. I us C latinus the second time, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio Asinalikewise a second time. As touching Cn. Cornelius Afina twice Conjul, thus writeth Valerius in his fixt book : Cn! Cornell's S. Afina, who being Conful was taken prifoner by the Carthaginians at Lipana when he had by the a Albert We law of arms loft whatfoever 'the had, recovered all again, and was made Conful the fecond time: fo as, of a Contol he became a captive, and of a captive twice Conful-

C. Semprenius,

Caffiedorus and Polybius put down for Con-iuls, Cn. Servilius and C. Sempronius. The Sicilian registers, Capio and Blafus. Zonoras, Servilius Capio and C. Sempronius. Emeropius and Orofine, Cn. Servilim Capio, and Sempronise Blafus, Of the fame Confuls, Sabinou in his 30 book maketh mention, as also a stone of the Capitol.

C. Aurelim Conta. P. Servilim.

Affiodorus bringeth in as Cost. C. Aurelius Cotta, and P. Geminus. The Sigilian regifters. Cotta and Geminus: but those of the Capitol, C. Aurelius Cotta, and P. Servilius Gemenue, Zonaras, Pub, Serviline and C. Aurelius. Cieero in his book, entituled Luculling, writeth, that C. Cotta, together with P. Servilim Gemium, was twice Conful. Frominus also in his fourth book of Stratagems, and likewife Oroftw, make mention of G. Cotta Conful in Sicily.

> 503 L. Cacilius Metellus. C. Furius.

DOlybius setteth down for Consuls, L.Cacilirs Metellus, and Cn. Furius. The Sicilian registers, Metellus and Pacilia. Zonaras, Caciline Metellus, and C. Furius. Coffiodorus, Ln. Cacilias and C. Furius. Eutropeus, Oforius, and a capitol stone, L. Cacilius Metellus, and Cn. Eurius Pacilus, This is that Lu. Metellus, twice Conful and high prieft, of whom Pliny writeth in his seventh book and three and fortieth

504 C. Atiling Regulus, L. Manlius

DOlybius placeth for this years Confuls, C. etcilins and L. Manlins, Caffodorus, C. Atilins Regulus, and L. Manlins. Orofins and a capital stone, have C. Atilius Regulus, and L. Manlius. Pulso, both Coff. the second time. Zonaras, C. Atilius the brother of Regulus, and L. Maulius. The Sicilian records, Regulus and Vulfo.

P. Clandins L. Junius.

C Affiodorate and Polybins infer for Confuls the text year, Pub Claudius and L. Junius. Zomares, L. Janins and C. Pulcher, Floras and Susronine in Tiberius, put to Claudius the futname of Patcher; and Cenformer to James of Pathos which allo are upon record living like Sichen and capitoline crolles. This IPC Landing, Clear (in his books of Divination, and the nature of gods) calleth the lott of Apr. Com: but Plan fin his feventh book and three and fortieth chapter? mamoth him his nephew or long ion. The capitol writers take part with Chero. Pal, Maximus in his first book and fourth chapter, speaketh of the same Confuls.

> P. Servilius. C. Aurelius

FOr Confuls this year , Caffiodorus putterli down P. Servilius and C. Anrelins. Cicero in his book Luculus, faith that these were twice Confuls. Which also is apparant by the Capia toll and Sicilian tables: in which their furnames are to be feen, Geminus II, and Coun II.

L. Cacilius. N. Fabina

T is recorded by C. fiedorse, that the Con-IT is recorded by Continued No Fabi-fuls of this year, were L. Cacilius and N. Fabiw : but Zonaras nameth them, Cacilins Metel. lus, and Numerius Fabius. Cufpinians Kalender and the Sicilian Registers, have them in this manner; Metellus II. and Buten II. But the capitoline tables shew them thus, L. Cacilius Metellus II. N. Fabius Buteo II. Pliny also reporteth in his seventh book, that Metellus was twice Conful.

> M'. Fabius. M'.Ct scilius,

CAffodorus fetteth down as Confuls, M'.Far binsand M'. Ocacilius. The Sicilian Regifters, Craffus and Licinius. Gellius in his tenth book and firt chapter, hath F. Licinius and Ocacilius Craffus. The capitol marble flones, M. Fabius Licinius, and M'. Otac.lins Craffus. Befides, Gellius in the place before alledged, Florus likewite in his 19 Breviary upon Livius maketh mention of their Confuls; as also Suetonius in Tiberius.

M. Falins. C. Atilius.

C. Affiodorus reckoneth M. Fabius, and C. Atilius, Consuls for this year. The Sicilian tables, Buteo and Bulbus. But those of the capitol, M. Fabius Butco, and C. Atilius Bulbus, Of Fabins the Confuls fhipwrack, Florus speaketh out of the nineteenth book of Livy.

A. Manlius C. Semoranlus

For this years Confols, Caffiodorus fetteth forth unto us, A. Manlins and C. Sempronius, The Sicilian records, Torquarus and Blafus, Cai filmans book hath Attiens and Blafus, The capita coline tables thew A. Manlins Torquatus Attiews, and C. Sempronius Blafus II.

C.Fundanius C.Sulpipius.

ters, Fundulus and Gallus. The Capitol monuments, C. Fundanius Fundulus, and C. Sulpisius Gallus, None belides make mention of them.

512 C. Lutatins Cataline. A. Postumius.

CAssiodorus delivereth unto us for Consuls this year, C. Lutains and A. Possamin. The Sicilian records, Cauchas and Albinus. Entropius, and the capitol marbles, C. Lutains Catulus, and A. Possamins Albinus.

Q. Lutatins Cereo. A. Manlins.

C Assiodorus, Entropius, and Orosius, shew for consultatins year, Q. Lusarius, and A. Mantius. The Sicilian records, Cerco and Torgustus. They of the capitol, Q Lusarius Cerco, and Au. Mantius: Torquatus Atticus 11. Indeed C. Lustius Gereo, is named for an Embassador by Livy in his 42 book.

C.Claudius Centho. M. Sempronius.

FOr this year there were Confuls, C. Claudius Centho, and M. Sempronius Tudit annus, according to Cassified with a the capitol writers. The Sicilian records tellify also the same surnames. Of these confuls likewise, besides the capitol Writers, Cicaro speaketh in his Caso and Brusus, where he calleth this year (according to the judgment of Attiens, where of Farri also agreeth) the $14 year from the soundation of the city; as also in his first. Tusculan question. So doth Gellius 17 book 21 chaps and Cossion.

C. Mamilius, Q. Valerius.

NExt there followed in confuls place, as witnesserius: but according to the Sicilian registers, Turrinus and Face: and after the capitol records, C. Mamilius Turrinus, and Q. Valcinis Felco. Besides, Verrius Flaceus and Cossionarus, Gellius also maketh mention of these Coss. in his 17 book and 22 chapter. So doth Cicero in Brunus and the Tre ulan questions, in which year they say, that Enviunthe Poet was born, 516 T. Sempronius. P. Valerius.

For the year following, Cassiodorus hath confuls, T. Sempronius and P. Valerius. Gracchus and Fales, in Cuspinians Kalender and the Sizilian records. Zongara avoutheth, Semp. Gracobus, and P. Valerius. The capitol writers, have T. Sempronius Gracchus, and P. Valerius Falco. Orosius incachus, and P. Valerius Falco.

L. Cernelius, Q. Fulvijus.

NExt to them, Caffiodorus reporteth for confuls, L. Cornelius and Q. Fulvins, Zenaras, L. Lenrulus and Q. Flaceus. Europius, L. Cornelius Lentulus, and Q. Fukvius Flaceus. The capitol registers give to Lantulus, the finname Gandenus: and therefore in Culpinius Kalender, they stand by the names of Candinus and Flaceus. As for the Sicilian registers, they leave them out clean.

C.Licinius. P.Cornelius.

Afflodorus putteth downfor confuls, C. Licinius and P. Cornelius. Zonavas, P. Lenulus and Licinius Varus. The capitoline writers. C. Licini: vVarus, and P. Cornelius Lenulus Gas di vas. In like manner Gesforius; who ree koneth this for the 518 year after the cities foundations following herein the computation of Varus, (seero, and Pluny Cuspinhaus Kalender and the Siciliar registers, name them Clandius and Varus.

519 T. M nlius Torquatus. C. Atilins,

This year had for confuls, as Cashadows faith, T. Manlius Torquesus, and C. Aisling. The Sicilian records, shew Torquesus, and the Capitoll Tables shew, T. Manlius Torquesus, and the capitoll Tables shew, T. Manlius Torquesus, and C. Aislius Bulbus: unro Bulbus The capitol records put to the numeral note II. When T. Manlius Torquesus and C. Aislius Bulbusthe second time were cost, according to Varius Flaceus, Entropus, Orofus, and Cossidonus, and that there was peace throughout allthe empire of Rome, the Temple of Janus was shut the second time, as Plusarch theweth in Noma; as Livip also, Velleius, Entropius, and Orosius, do tettify.

L. Pestumius. 520 Sp. Carvilius.

CAssiodorns nameth for consuls this year, I. Pest R. ins and Sp. C. routurs. The Sicilian Registers have Albums and Ruga. Zonam, Possion into Albums, and Sp. Carodins. The tapicol writers have L. Possion Albums, and Sp. Carodins Albums, and Sp. Carodins Albums, and Sp. Carodins Albums, and Sp. Carodins Maximus. That Ruga was almame to the Carotin, appeareth out of Gilms, who maketh mention of Sp. Carodins Ruga, who at this time was the first that divorced his wife.

Q. Fabius. M'. Pomigonius.

CAffiodorus putteth down for confuls, Q.Fabins and Mt. Pomponius. The Sicilian records Maximus and Matho. The capitoline writers have Q.Fabins Maximus Verneous, and M. Pomponius Matho. Zonaras hath Q.Fabins Max. and M. Pomponius. The furname of Maximus, this Fabins such of his grand-lather and was not himself first, of that more, whatfoever Polytons writesth in his third book.

Farmessus he was called besides of a west upon his lip, at Platarch witnesseth, and he that wrote the treatile of Famous men.

M. Lepidus. M. Poplicius.

Marcus Lepidus and M. Poplisius are reputed to be Confuls this year by Cassiodorus. The Sicilian registers have Lepidus and Malleolus, Zonaras hath M. Malleolus and M. Emplius. The capitol tables shew M. Emplius Lepidus and M. Poplicius.

C.Papirins. M. Pamponins.

NExt after this were created Confuls, C. Papirus and M. Pomponius according to Caffodorus, Zimaras, and Disonfius in his second book. The Sicilian registers shew Maso and Matho. But the Capitol records have C. Papirius Maso and M. Pomponius Masho. Of C. Papirus, Con of C. Starbamed M. So., a Pontity or Bishop, Livy speaketh in the year 540.

M. Emylius. M. Junius.

Onavas and Caffindorns exhibit unto us for Confuls, M. Emplies and M. Junius. The Scilian registers, Barbula and Pera. The Capitol records, M. Emplies Barbula and M. Junius Pera.

L. Poftumins. Cn. Fulvins.

C Affindances ferreth down. L. Possemine and Con, Fulvines as Consuls. The Sicilian records Assimus and Centenuatus. But those of the Capitol, and Eutropius, present unto us L. Possemines Albinus and Con, Fulvines Centenuatus, Polybius nameth (n. Fulvines and A. Possemines.

Q. Fabin: 11. 526 Sp. Carvillus.

There are by Coffinders's nominated for Controls this year; Qu. Fabius Maximus the fectored time, and Sp. Carvilius. The Sicilian registers Maximus and Ruga. The Capitol writers fee allo unto Carvilius Maximus, the mark and numeral note of a double Confulfaip. Ciero in his book of Rhetorical invention, maketh mention of their Confuls, and so don't Valerius in his chapter, discouring of the kindnes and affectionate duty of children to their parents.

P. Valerius. 527. M. Atilius.

Thele are fet down by Coffedorat for Coff.
this year, P. V slower and My stillen. The Sicilian registers, have Florid and Regular, The Capitol records represent P. Valerius Elaccua, and M. Atilius Regulus, Gellius writeth of them in his 4 book and 3 chapter.

L. Apustus. M.Valerius.

NExt after, Cofficatorus putteth L. Apuftius and M. Valerius Consuls, The Sicilian tables Maximus and Apuftius, The Capitol monuments L. Apuftius Fullo, and M. Valer, Meffala.

C. Atilius, 529

I Mmediatly followed Confuls, C. Asilius and L. Emplius, as Caffodorus and Polybius do witness: whom the Capitol writers call, C. Attitus Regulus, and L. Emplius Papus. The Sicilian registers, Regulus and Papus. Zonarus, Regulus and Emplius. Of these Confuls also Orossius maketh mention: and Pliny in his third book and twentieth chapter, where unruly men read Panlus for Papus.

T. Manlins. 930 Q. Falvius II.

The year following had Confuls T. Manlins and Q. Fulvins the fecond time, according to G. flodorins and Polybinst, and as Orofus faith, T. Manlins Torquatus and Q. Falvins Flacons, Guspinians tables, together with the Capitoline, have Torquaus the second time, and Flucous likewise the second time, the humanes only of these Coss.

C. Flaminius. P. Furius Philus.

Callidarus letteth down for Coff. C. Flaminius and P. Furius. So doth Palybius. Zonavan nameth them Flaminius and Furius. Plantarch likewife in Marcellus. The Sicilian tables name, them Flaminius and Philus. But the capitol records, C. Flaminius, and P. Furius Philus.

M.Marcellus. Cn. Cornelius.

C Affiodorus nameth for the next Coniuls, M. Marcellus and Cn. Cornellus. Patipius, M. Claudius, and Cn. Cornellus. The Sicilian reginers Scipio and Marcellus. Zonoras, Claudius Marcellus and Cn. Scipio, Eutropius, M. Claudius Marcellus and Cn. Cornellus Scipio, The Capicallus, and Cn. Connellus Scipio, The Capicallus and Cn. Cornellus Scipio Catunt. This is that Marcellus, who was five times Conful! and this is that Scipio, who dictawards with his brother Scipio was flain in Spain by Afdrubatthe Carthaginnas.

P. Cornelius. 533 M. Minntins.

C. Affadarus . fineweth for this years Confuls, Cornelins and M. Minusius, So doth Zonas, V V V V V 2

rm. The Sicilian registers have Scipio and Rufus, Entropius hath P. Gornisius and M. Minnesse Rufus. Copinians book Afina and Rufus. Signisans book Afina and Rufus. Signisans book Afina was the Signis Afina was his son, who in the first Punick was was twice conful. And verify Livy, in the year 543 maketh mention of P. Cornelius Afina, an honorable Senator, and who had been conful.

L. Veturius. 534 C. Lutatius.

Affodorus and Zonaras exhibit unto us for confuls, L. Veturius and G. Lutatius. The Sicilian registers Philo and Catulus. Cuspinians book Philo and Seavela.

M. Levius. L. Emylius.

The confuls next following were M. Livius and L. Emylius, as Cafiseder us witneffeth. Cuffinians book and the Greek records flew Salineter and Paulus. Zonarus, M. Livius and Emylius Paulus. Plny maketh mention of these confuls in the 29 book and first chapt.

P.Cornelius Scipio. T.Sempronius Longus.

CAssociate and Polybius pur down for consuls P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius. Zonata, Sempronius Longus and P. Scipio. The Socialian records, Longus and Scipio. Livy, Europuss, Probus, Orofus, and Pedianus, name them P. Cornelius Scipio, and T. Sempronius Longus. Whiles these were consuls, the second Punick war arose, as writers have delivered unto us in their chronicles.

Cn. Servilius Geminus. C.Flaminius.

THen followed confuls, as Polybins, Caffiodo rus, and Livy write, Cn. Servilius, together with C.Flaminius. But the two last named, as alfo the Sicilian registers, have given to Servilins the furname of Geminus, C. Flaminius now fecond time conful, with like pride as heretofore entered into his magistracy in the Ides of March not at Rome but at Ariminum. The same. man, in neglect and contempt of the Auspicia or figns of birds, at what time as he made head and went against Annibal coming into Italy, fought a battel at the lake Thralymenus, where his army, was wholly defeated and himfelf loft his life : into whole place M. Atilius Regulus, who had been conful before, was libitatuted. Thus much out of Lizy and Polybins.

538 C. Terentius Parro. L. Emylius Paulus.

Next to them Polybins bringeth in L. Emylius and C. Terentius for confuls, The Sicilian registers, Pa Lou and Varro: Planarch in Paulus, Teremini Varro, and Amylins Paulin. Ling, Cossidodomes, and others, C. Teremini Varro, and L. Emplius Paulin. Golizins noteth, that the father of C. Teremini Varro, was one Aulin, a thing by others passed over.

L. Posthumius Albinus. III. M. Glaudius Marcellus. II. Q.Fabius Maximus, III. T. Sempronius Gracchus.

Toy reporteth that the confuls elect for this year, when M. Junius the Distator held the solemn assembly for the election, were Lucius Posthumins Albinus the third time, who as then ruled the province of Gant, and T. Sempronius Gracchus, who had been mafter of the horfemen: and that Post humius before that he entred into government, was by Annibal in France environed and flain, in whose flead M. Marcellus was subrogated conful now the second time: who upon information given by the Augurs. that his creation was not good, religned: and commonly the Nobles gave out and faid. That the Gods were not well pleased, that two commoners were then first chosen consuls: whereupon in the room of Marcellus, Quintus Fabius Maximus was chosen consul the third time. Thus write Lipy and Pluresch. And for this caule it is that Cafsigdorne, Orofins, and Entropini do put down for this years confuls, T. Semproning and Q. Fabins.

Q. Fabius, IV. M. Glandins Marcellus, III.

Loy, Plutarch, and Cafriedorus, fet out for confuls this year, Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and M. Claudas Marchins the third time. Moreover, Cicero oftentines and Frontinus, in his fecond, book of straigents, make mention of the fet onfuls;

541 Q. Fabius Max. son of Verrucosus. T. Sempronius Gratthus, II.

A Gainst this year were both the consuls created in their absence, namely, Q.F.M. Mar, the son of Vernacofar, and T. Semprimus Gaichar the scoon of the same the scoon times as Livy testingth and Coffedorus, together: with the Sicilian registers. This Fabius had been literor the former year and Gracefus consult two years before. These consults Gallius nominatesh out of Quadriprims, the second book and scoon chapter. Likewise Gailles and Valdenia, the App. Claudius Pulcher.

Q. Fulvius Fläcens, III.

The confuls created for this year by the Dichatos, were Quining Fulcius Flacens the third time, who then was master of the horsemen, and Appless Claudius Pulcher, who in his pretorship was L. deputy in Sicily, as Livy, Plutarch in Fabius, Callindorns, and Fefins in his 17 book do witness.

C. Sulpitius Galba. Cn. Fulvius Centumalus.

Pon the receit of certain letters, the Con-Viuls agreed together, that Claudius should hold the election for magistrats and see is finished, whiles Futoius remained still before Capua, Claudius created for consuls, Cn. Futoius Centumalus, and P. Sulpitius son of Servius, and surnamed Galba, who before time had been no state-office of the chair. Thus writest Livius. The same consuls also Cossionadoth deliver. Orosast likewise and Festus in his 17 book. The Sicilian seconds declare Galba and Centumalus. As for S. Sulpitius, he is named in his second consulship, assis appeareth upon record in the capitol, the son of Ser. nephew of Publius surnamed Galba Maximus.

M.Val. Levinus, II. M. Claudius Marcellus, IV.

LIvy, Sextus Pompeius, Valerius Maximus, Plux tareh, Florus, Entropies, and Orofius, do prefent for confuls this year, M. Claudius Marcellus and M. Valerius Lavinus. Now this is Marcellus his fourth consulfhip, as Plusarch and Livy write : but Caffiodorus faith, that he was but the third time with M. Valerius Lavinus, leaving out that confulfhip which he bare not through, because of the errour in his creation: and yet is it one of the five that he is reported to have born. Livy in the nine and twentieth and thirtieth books, writeth that M.Valerius was twice conful. In like manner, the book of Cufpinian hath for this year, Marcellus the fourth time, and Levinus the second time. And therefore Onuplyius supposeth that his first consular was in the year five hundred four-and-thirty: and his fecond, now. Of him Polybins and Cicero make mention. The start in the start well with the

to water and his charts not have been 545

Q. Fabius Maximus V. Q. Fulvius Flacens IV.

The confuls for this year created, were Qi Fabius, the fift time, and Q. Fabius Flatius the forth time, the fame man who being Dictator, held the affembly for that election is Livy and Caffedorus do witness. The Sicinar records let forth Fabius and Flacen. Whiles these were confuls Cierra in his Oration against Rullus, faith that Capua was won to a confuse the confuse of the Capua was won the Confuse of the Capua was won the Of the Confuse Patrine also, essected with Plutarch, Eutrapius, and Greene Dave and made mention.

M. Claudia Marcellas V. L. World T. Quintine Griffinus.

IN the eleventh year of the Punick war, there entred into their contillhip, M. Marcellus the fift time (to ye reckon that contillhip which upon an error in the creation he kept not) and T. Quimini Cripinins. So faith Livy. Plutarely also nameth Marcellus the fift time and cripinins. But Caffiodorus reckoneth Marcellus but the fourth time with Cripinins, passing over that faulty consular of his. Moseover these consuls are mentioned by Cicero Valerius; #11. minthe yonger, Probus, Europius, and Orofius: who also report that they both were forelaid and intrapped in ambush by Annibal: in so much as Marcellus was presently slain in the place, and Quintius sted sore wounded.

C.Claudius Nero.
M,Lsvins Salinator

When the LL. of the Setiat cast about to see whom they should create consults, behold, the most eminent and insulari man above all others, was C. Claudins Novement and insulari man above all others, was C. Claudins Novement M. Lisnist, who many years before, upon a consular that he had born, was by the judgment of the people condemned: and Marcus Marcus Marcullus, and Marcus Living their consults, reduced into thecity; in like manner, the Scillar Registers name for consults. Next and Salantor. The capital records show Chandras Neros, with Ma Living Salantor;

Q.Cacilius Metellus. L.Veturius Philo.

Loy, Cassiodorus, and the records of the cappitol, exhibit unto us for confusit his year, Lotenius Philos, and Q. Cacitius Merellus, The Sicilian registers. A. Posthumius Albinus. C. Calpurnius Piso.

Ley, Caffodorm, and the capitol monuments exhibit unto us for this years Confuls, A. Posshamin Albinus, and C. Calpurnius Piso. The Sicilian tables, Albinus, and Piso. Piso was Pretor in the year $67. And Albinus anno $68. But whenas a pestilence had reigned now three years, so as it dispeopled the City of Rome and all Isas, it hapned that C. Calpurnius died, nor without suspicion that he was murdered by Q. Hossilia in whose room Q. Fulvius Flaceut his father in law or mothers husband, was declared Consul.

L. Manlius Acidinus. Q. Fulvius Flacens.

Ley, Cassindare, and the capitol records shew for Consuls this year, L. Manlius Acidimus and Q. Falsung Flaccus, The Sicilian tables, Acidimus with Flucus, Cicero maketh mention of Acidimus' a Consul, in his second book of a perfect orator. Also observed it is in the capitol monuments, that these Consuls were german brethren: and the same hath Velleius in his second book reported. And thereby it cometh to pass, that in the capitol tables L. Manlius Acidimus, is surnamed also Fulvanus after the minner of those that are adopted.

576 Al Junius Brutus. A Manlius Vulfo.

Pi Ext Confuls exerted, were M. Junius Bratus and A. Manius Vulfo: as Livy, Caffiodore, and the capitol records do tefitiy. Bratus and Vulfothey be named in the Sicilian monuments. This Bratus was Pretor in the year 562, and Vulfo in 571,

C. Claudius Pulcher, Teb Sempronius Gracchus,

Ain: Clandino Pulcher and Wik, Semponius of Gracehus, are matched Confuls this year by Ver. Pilacous, Livy, and Caffederus. Of this Tifa. Gracehus, cieros speakets in his fift book of dir vination, and Frontons in his fift of strategeme.

578 C. Cornelius Scipio Hispalus, Q. Posilius Spurinus, C. Valerius Lavinus.

Loy, Collisdora, and the capitol secords cahibit unto us for Confuls, C., Cornolins Scipio Hispalus, and Q. Pestina Sparinat. The Sicilian Registers, Scape and Pestina. But when as Scipio returning out of the mount Albanu, fell into a fit of Apoplexy, and so into a dead palley, whereupon he went to the bath at Camer, where, by reason that his difeate grew upon him, he departed this life; Q. Pestina the other Conful, created for his companion to enter prefertly upon the government, C. Valerius Lavinus. Thus faith Livy.

P. Mutius Scavola. M. Aemilius Lepidus II.

Rosins putteth down for Consuls Lepidno and Munius, Cassiodorus and Obsquent, M. Lepidno and P. Munius. The Sicilian tables, Lepidno and P. Munius. The capitol monuments, P. Munius Scavola and M. Lepidno and M. Lepidno of the Consuls this year is left in Livy. Cicero likewise writeth in his disconse of Provinces: "Aterias also in his fix book and fixt chapter, that this M; Emplius Lepidno was twice Consuls."

Sp. Posthumius Albumus, Q. Musius Scavela, C. Assiedorus setteth down for Consuls, Sp. Posthumius and Q. Musius. The capitol records, Sp. Posthumius Albumus Paulus, and Q. Musius Scavela, Cuspinians book hath Paulus and Scavela, Pliny maketh mention of these inhis second book and 31 chapter. The election of the Consuls this year is lost in Lavy.

581 L.Posthumim Albanus. M.Popilius Lanas.

The Coff for this year created, were L. Postbusinis Albinns and M. Popilins Laun, as Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol monuments do tedity. Albinns and Launs are put down in the Sicilian records, Whiles these were consisthe feaft Floralia was instituted first, as Ovid the weth in his fift book of his Kalender,

C.Popilius Lanas. P. Elius Light.

This year had for confuls, C. Popilius Lanas, and P. Elius Light, as Livy, Caffiodorsi, and the capitol records do testify. The Sicilian registers name them Lanas and Ethes. To this day had no Coss. in one year been matched to gether, both commoners and this was the first time, that both confuls were created out of the commons, as is observed in the capitol monments. After this, you shall never find the commons also both Patritis: commoners ye shall have them both twain, many a time and often; but most of all, a commoner and a Patrician, one with another.

P.Licinine Craffue. C. Cassius Longinus.

The Consuls next ensuing for this year, were P. Lieinius Crassus, and C. Cassius Longiuns, as it appeares the in Livy, Cossius Longiuns, on the capitol tables. For in the Sicilian records, they are named no otherwise than Crassus and Longus, Of the very same Consuls Pliny maketh mention in his seventh book, Gestius also in his ninth book and fourth chapter. Whiles these were Consuls the people of Rome began war against Persus King of the Macedonians, son of Philip: which Florus and Eutropius, together with Orosius, call the second Macedonian war: whereof Livy and Plutarch write more at large, 584 A. Hostilius Mancinus. A. At lins Serranus.

C Assindaris setteth next after for Consuls, C. Host lius Mancinus, and C. Atilius. The Scillan registers, Mancinus and Serranus. The capitol monuments, A. Atilius Mancinus, and Au, Atilius Serranus. As well the election of these Consuls as their acts, are missing in the Annals of Livy.

Q. Martius Philippus, 11. Cn. Servilius Capio.

Loy, C. flodgrus, and the capitol tables match together in the Confulfilip of this year Q. Martins Philippys the second time, and Cn. Servilius Capio. The Sicilian catalogue hath barely Philip and Capio. Gioero in his books entituled Brutus and Cato, writeth that Ennius the Poet died in their Confular.

586 L. Emylius Paulus, II. C. Licinius Crassus.

The Conful: that next succeeded were Lu.

Emplius Paulus the second time (seventeen years after his first Consulship) and Cains Licinius Crassia: witness Livy, Cassiadorus, and the capitol monuments. In like manner they are named in the Sicilian registers Paulus and Crassia, As tonching this second Consulat of L. Paulus, Pluiarch, Velleius, Orosius, Eutropius, Florus; and Justinus in his 32 book do write.
Plutareh addeth thus much and saith, That Paulus was threefore years of age, when he was chosen Consul the second time.

Q. Elius Patus. M. Junius.

Low bringeth in for Confuls next after, Qu. Emplius and M. Junius. The Sicilian records Parul and Pennus. Objequent and Caffordyus Q. Elius Vitus, and M. Junius Pennus. Cicro likewife in Brunus speaketh of Mar. Junius Pennus Conful with Q. Elius. Now from this year forward, we want the compleat ftory penned by Livy.

M. Marcellus. C.Sulpitius.

Loy and the capitol monuments shew for this years Contuls, M. Claudius Marcellus, and C. Sulpini. Fallusi. Obsequent, and the title prefixed before the comedy Andrian Trence, exhibit Mar. Marcellus and C. Sulpinius. This is that Marcellus, who after he had been thrice Contul, perished in the sea. Nephew he was of that M. Marcellus, who had been five times Consul, as Padianus reporteth. Of these Consults, 3r string, 11mj inhis second book, and many other have made mention.

Cn. Octavius. 7. Manlius.

C Affiodorus and Obsequent inser Consuls the year, Cn. Ottawius and T. Manlius. The Sicilian tables, Ottawius and Torgustus. The capitolitones. (r. Ottawius and T. Manlius Torquatus. Mention there is made of these consuls in the title set before Heyra in Terence. Cicero in his first book of Final ends, and likewise in many other places, speaketh of T. Torquatus, Gonsul with Cn. Ottawius.

A. Manlius. Q.C. fins.

Affindorus matcheth together confuls in this year, A. Manlius and Q.C. flins. The Sicilian catalogue hath Torquants and Longinus, The capitol records A. Manlius Torquants and Qu.C. offins Longinus, who died in his confulhip. Their allo had been companions together in their Pretorship, anno 586, as Livy beareth witness.

T. Sempronius. M. Inventius.

CAssiodorus saith, that the consuls this year were T. Sempronius and M. Inventius. Obsequents nameth them, T. Graechus, and M. Inventius. The capitol monments shew T. Sempronius Graechus the second time, and M. Inventius Thalva. In the Sicilian registers, Dolabella and Thalva. but not well as it is to be doubted. Cicero, Valevius, and Plusarch have made mention of Tib. Graechus twice contul. And that M. Inventius died whiles he was contil, Pliny in seventh book, and Valerius also do report;

P.Cornelius Scipio Nafica. C. Martins.

CIcero in his first and second book of the fiage ture of Gods. Verrius Flaceus, Obsequens and Cassion, report for confuls P. Cornel, Scipio Massica and C. Martins Figus: 3. But for that there was an error committed in their creation; and thereupon they resigned up their place, as the forefaid authors witness together with Valerius Platacch and Pliny: P. Corn. Lenulus, and Cu. Domitius Enobarbus, entred in their seas;

M. Messala. C. Fannius,

Afflodorus putteth down for Confuls, M. Meffala and C. Fannius. The Sicilian Catalogue Meffala and Strabo. The capitol records, and the title before Phormio in Terence teprefent unto us, M. Valerius Meffala, and Caius Fannius Strabo. Of these Confuls Sweionius maketh mention in his book of excellent Rhetoricians. Likewise in Cicero in Brutus, Pliny in his ninth book and sificieth chapter, and Gellius in his second book.

L. Anicius. M. Cornelius Cethegus.

CAssiodorus and the title set before the Comedy Adelphi in Terence avouch for Coss.

L. Anicius and M. Cornelius. The Sicilian and capitol records put surnames unto them Gallus and Cethegus. Of Anicius the Consul, Giero speaketh in Brutus: and of Cethegus, the six and fortieth Epitome or Breviary of Florus, In their year, it is for certain held, that L. Par lus who conquered Persons, died.

595 Cn. Cornelius Dolabella. M. Fulvius.

The year next following had Confuls as witnefleth Cassodor's, Cn. Cornelius Dolabella and M. Felvine. The Sicilian registers shew D. Lobella and Fulvine. The capitol monuments, Cn. Cornelius Dolabella and Mar. Fulvines Nobilior. The same is to be seen in the life of Terence the poet, for there it is written, that in their year he died.

N. Emplius. C. Popilius.

THE Confuls next incceeding, were Marcus Emplius and C. Popilius, as Caffiodorus faith. The Sicilian catalogue (heweth Lepidus and Lanas. The capitol records have M. Emplius Lepidus and C. Popilius Lenas the (econd time. Of the fame. Cenforings maketh mention in his chapter of diffinction of ages.

Sex. Jul us. 597 L. Aurelius.

Q.Fabins Maximus, L.Hostiliuse

Caffledorus this year delivereth unto us for Confuls, Q. Fabius, Maximus, together with L. Hoftlinis. Cicero in Lales, and Plun in his five and thirtieth book and fourth chapter, nameth them Q. Maximus, brother of Scipio, and L. Mancins. Of this Q. Falius Maximus Emplianas, Valerius written in his lecondbook and fift chapter. This Q. Fabius was the fon of P. Emplius, adopted by Q. Fab. Max. the fon of Vervicalus, as Appianus written in Hifpanensis and therefore in the fragment of a capitol table there is to be feen the fecond furname Emplianus. Pliny was deceived, who in his 31 book 11 chapter-calleth him Qu. Aliebrogicus, brother of Scipio, who was the fon of this Fabius.

610 Ser. Galba. L. Aurelius.

This year had for Confuls, Ser. Galha and Lu. Aurelius, according to Caffiodorus: those, Falerius in his fixt book nameth S. Sutpitius Galba, and Lu. Aurelius Cotta. whom the Sicilian catalogue sheweth under the bare names of Galba and Cotta. But the capitol fragments have Galba and Cotta. But the capitol fragments have Galba and L. Falerius Cotta. This is that Sulf Galba. who being Pretor, as Sustainis writeth, slitted up the war before against Viriatus, for he was a vehement Orator, of whom Creero speaketh many times. And as for L. Cotta, he it was though a times. And as for L. Cotta, he it was though a times and against Verres, many times. Qu. Metellus Maccalonicus desended. Cicero in Brusus for Murena and against Verres, maketh mention of him Likewise Frontinus of them both, in his sight book of water conduits.

Ap. Clandins. Q. Metellus.

Assistance of this years Consuls Appins Clanding and Q. Metellus, Orofus, App. Clauding and Q. Metellus, Orofus, App. Clauding and Qu. Cacilius Metellus. The Sicilian registers have Clauding and Metellus. The capitol fragments shew Pulcher and Q. Cacilius Macedonicus, Of the same, Frontisms speaketh in his book of water-conduits, and Valerius in his seventh book, Now this Metellus is he who being Pretor, subdued the Macedonians and Acheans, wereupon he was surnamed Macedonicus; whom Plinies 7 book sheweth to be the son of Lu, and nephew of Quin.

L. Metellus. Q. Maximus.

CAssiodorus putteth down for Consuls, Lu. Metellus and Q. Maximus. The Sicilian records Metellus and Maximus. Orosius, L. Cacilius Metellus and Q. Fabius Maximus Servilianus. In like maner the capitol fragments Calous and Servilianus. This Servilianus is the brother german of Q. Servilius Capio, the Consul two years after (as witnesseth Appian) and the adopted son of Q. Fabius Runslanus; for they were both adopted by Q. Fabius Max, the son of Vertucosius, the one out of the house Emplia, the other of Servilia, L. Metellus is the brother of Q. Metellus Maccolonicus, as written Valerius in his treatifie of Witnesses.

Cn. Capio. Q. Pompeius.

Confuls by Caffiodorus. Velleius in his fecond book faith thus: Whether there were two or three houses of the Pempeies, the first of that name was Conful with Cn. Servilius. Of this Q. Pompeins, Cicero maketh mention oftentimes, writing that he was of base and obscure parentage. Him Valerius in his chapter of witnelles nameth Aufidus, but corruptly through the fault of the copiers, in flead of au, F. i, the ion of Aulas. In the same fort Appianus in Hi-Spanensis nameth him Qu. Pompeius Aulus for A. Filius. Cicero in his Orations against Verres, and in that for Fonteius, Valerius also in his chapter of Witnesses, sheweth that there were two brethren named Cneus and Quintus, both Servilii Capiones.

Q.Capio. C.Lalins.

A Fter this were Confuls made, Qu. Capio and C. Lalius, my authors are Caffiodorus and Obsequents together with the Sicilian tables, and Frontinus in his treatife of water-conduits. This Lalius as Gieero in his eleventh Philippick, and Velleius do report, was the son of Lalius the the Conful, anno 564, whom as Gieero in his fecond book of Duties and in Lalius, was the firth that was furnamed Wife, whereof Plusarch in Graechi yeeldeth a reason.

Cn. Pifo. M. Popilius.

Caffiodorus sheweth for this years Confuls, Cun. Pifo with M. Popitius. Apidupes and the Epitomith thave M. Popitius Lexas: but they be named M. Popitius Lexas and L. Calpurnius by Valerius in his fift book, writing thus, That Cornelius Hifpalus, Lord chief justice for strangers, when M. Popitius Lexas and L. Calpurnius were Confuls, by an edick commanded all the Chaldran [Astrologers] to depart out of some and staly within ten daies next entiting.

P. Scipio. D. Brutus.

Mblius Scipio and D. Brutus are named for this years Coff by Coffiodorus .. Florus in his 55 Epitome; P. Cornelius Nafice (furnamed Serapion in mockery by G. Curiainia Trib. of the Com.) and D. Junius Brutus Coff, levied and mustered souldiers &c. This Scipio was son of that Nafica who was furnamed Corculum, and twice was he Conful and Cenforalfo, nephew to that Nafica, who by the Senat was deemed the best man in the City, and father to him that warred upon Ingurtha, as Velleius faith. This Decims Brutus, Cicero in his Brutus calleth the fon of Marcus, who bare the Confulfhip in the year five hundred ninety leven. and in the capitol tables is called Pennus. Moreover, of these Consuls Cicero speaketh very oft. Valerius also in his 3 book, chap. 7. 5 book, chap. 3. 9 book, chap. 1 5: Likewife, Pliny in his 21 book, and laftly, Frontinus.

M. Emylius. C. Hostilius Mancinus.

C. Assionary and Objequens match together in the confushing this year, M. Amylins, and C. Hossilins Mancinus, The Sicilian registers and C. pidus and Mancinus, Orofius and Appun, M. Amylins Lepidus and C. Hossilins Mancinus. Of this Consul Mancinus there remainly extone tokens to be seen in broken marbles of the capitol, Gicero maketh mention often-times of Lepidus, as well in other places as in Bruus. Likewise, Valerius, Florus, Paterculus, and Pliny in his treatise of Famous men.

P.Furius. Sen. Attilius Serranus.

CAssiders putteth down for Consuls, P. Furius and Sex. Astilius Serramus. Gicero in his third book of Duties, L. Furius and Sex. Astilius Obsequent, L. Furius and Astilius Serramus. The Sicilian registers Pstilius and Serramus. Of this Furius; Cicero writeth thus in his Brutus; Lu.
Furius; Philus, was reputed for a man of very good language, and to have spoken more learnedly than others. In the capitol fragments there appeareth yet some shew of Serramus the Consul.

619 Ser. Fulvius, C. Calpurnius.

The next confuls are fet down by Caffiodon purnius. The Sicilian catalogue hath Flaccus and Offgapens, Ser. Fulvius and O. Calpurnius. The Sicilian catalogue hath Flaccus and Pifo, Orofius nameth S. Fulvius Flaccus and Q. Calpurnius Pifo. The capitol fragments flow Pifo: as for Fulvius Flaccus the Conful, mention there is made of him in the Epitome 36. Appian also in his Illyrica speaks of him, and in Hispanensis of Calp. Pifo.

P. Africanus. C. Fulvius Flaceus.

The year following had P. Africann; and C. Fulvius Flacent for Cost, as it is written in Cossiodars and Obsequent; But Scipio and Flacen; in the Scillan catalogue. The same Flacens the Capitol fragments do shew, Ofthis C. Fulvius, mention there is made also in the 56 Epitome; and of Africanus twice consulty Appian in Hispanensis, by Orosius, Florus, and Valerius in his eight book.

P. Mucins. L.Calpurnius.

THis year had confuls, P. Mucius, and Lu. Calpurnins, as witnesseth Cassiodorus. The Sicilian registers shew Scavola and Calpurnius. Velleius nameth P. Mucius Scavola and L. Calpurnius. Of these Consuls Padsanus upon the Orations against Verres, maketh mention in these words: Scavola a right learned man in the Laws, was conful with L. Pifo, that year wherein Tib. Oracchus was killed. In the broken marbles of the capitol he standeth by the name of L. Calpurnius Pifo, surnamed also Frugi, and that truly. For Cieero in one Oration against Verres and in another for Fonteins writeth, that he was the first of the Pitones, called Fragi. This man, when he was Tribune or Provost of the Commons, madea law against the extortion of magistrats, when Martius and Manilius were coniuls : he wrote also the annals of Rome, as Cicero testifieth in his book Brutus.

P. Popilius. P. Rupilius.

A Gainst this year were consuls created, as Cassisdarus writeth, P. Popilius and P. Repilius: after the Sicilian records Lamas and Rupilius: Cicero maketh mention of them in his 13 book of Epistles to Articus, and against Verves. Also in the capitol fragments we read of P. Popilius, son of Caius, and P. Rupilius fon of P. and nephew of Publius: Velleius in his second book, nameth the consuls Rupilius and Popilius. Cicero in Lalius speaketh of Rupilius and Lamas. And of P Rupilius there is mention made in the Epitome or Breviary 59.

P. Craffus. 623

CAffiodorus putteth down for confuls this year, Pub. Crassus and Lu. Valerus, Crassus and Flacens the Sicilian catalogue, L. Valerus Flacens and Pub. Licinius Crassus, according to Cicero in his eleventh Philippick against Antony. Of this conful Pu. Licinias Craffus, all they have spoken, who wrote of the war of Ar flonicus, This P. Crassius surnamed Dives, by Cicero in his books of a perfect Orator, and in Brutus is called the brother of Scavola: whereupon Velleins in his fecond book nameth him Mutianus, betokening thereby that he was adopted out of the house of Marie into the family of the Crafit. This man Gellin's writeth in his first book and 23 chapt. to have been of all others the richest man, the noblest personage, and the most eloquent Orator, the deepest lawyer, and the supream Bishop withal.

C. Claudius, M. Perpenna,

A Ppius Claudius and M. Perpenna are matched in the Consular cogether this year by Obsequens and Cassiodorus. Cuspinians book and the Greek records, thew Lentulus and Perpenna. This Claudius haply was adopted into the family of the Cornelii. Moreover, Cicero in his third book of Laws, and in the Oration for Plancius, calleth this man C. Claudius. This also is confirmed by an old table offione commonly known, wherin is to be feen this inscription, C. Claudius and M.Perpenna Coss. Which evidence Sigonius and Onuphrius following, named him C.Claudius and not Appius. Of this M. Perpenna as many as wrote the war of Aristonicus, have made mention, and namely, Valerius in his 3 book and 4 chapt. Velleins, Strabo, Orofius, and Eutropius.

C.Sempronius. M. Aquilius.

This year had confuls, M. Aguilins and C. Sempronius, as witneffeth Caffiodorns. But Aguilins and Tuditamus according to the Sicilian registers, C. Sempronius Tuditanus, and M. Aguilins after Orofius. Gieero speaketh of them in his book of the nature of gods, and to his brother Quintus, Paterculus allo in his second book, Strabo in his 14 book. Appian in his sift book. And both of them are taken out of the triumph records in the capitol.

626 Cn. Octavius. T. Annius.

NExt followed as confuls Cn.Octavius and T. Annius, ar Cafiodorus testifieth and none but he. For Cuspinians book and the Scillian catalogue have Octavius and Rufus, Plus trohalfo writeth, that one T. Annius contended with Tib.Gracchus in a sedition. As for this C.Octavim, ion he was to that Cnens who was Conful in the year five hundred eighty nine.

CAfflodorus nameth for this years Confuls, L. Cafiius and L. Cinna. The Sicilian records Longinus and Cinna. Culpinians books fet out Rulla, corruptly for Ravilla, and Cinna. This L. Cafiius was his fon who bare the confulfhip in the year 590, and he was afterwards Cenfor in the year 629 furnamed Ravilla by Frontinus.

645 . Q. Metellus. M. Silanus.

CAssodorus faith that the Consuls next following were Q. Metellus and M. Silanus. The Sicilian catalogue theweth Metellus and Silanus. Padianus and Eutropius. Qu. Cacilius Metellus Numidicus, and M. Junius Silanus. Ofthem alfo Gicero speaketh in Brutus, This Metellus Was furnamed Numidicus for the conquest of Numidia, as witneffeth Velleius.

Ser. Galba. M. Scaurus.

Caffiedorus and Obsequent deliver for the Consuls of this year, Servint Galba and M. Scaurus. The Sicilian evidences, Sulpitius and Scaurus. Cicero in the Oration for Rabirius, faith that S. Galba was a man of Consular degree, when Marius was the fixt time Conful-Of M. Scaurus the Conful, Velleius and Tacitus make mention. This is that M. Aurelius Scaurus, who being afterwards in embaffage was by the Cimbrians murdered, as appeareth in the threeicore and seventh Epitome.

L. Cassins.

CAfsiodorus joineth in the consulship this year, L. Gaffins and C. Marins. Cufpinians book and the Sicilian records, Longenus and and Marius, Pliny also maketh mention of them in his 10 book and 13 chap. Cicere in his oration for Plancius: Plutarch in Marius; and Cicero again in his third book of Duties, writeth, that C. Marius having taken the repulse twice for the office of Ædileship, was created conful.

Q. Servilius Capio. C. Atilius.

Blequens and Cassiodorus match consuls to-gether this year, Q. Servilius Capie and C. Atilius Serranus. The Sicilian monuments Capio and Serranus. In this year upon the third day of January, M. Tullius Cicero was born, as Gellius in his fifteenth book and eight and twentieth chapt. hath left written. Much mention there is made of these consuls in Cicero and other ancient writers.

P. Rusilius Rufus. C. Manilius.

The Chronologie

Oublins Rutilins Rufus and C. Manilius, are put down by Obsequens and Caffiedorns for this years confuls. This P. Rutilini, Cicero in Brutus, calleth the fon of Marcus, About the other conful the Annals do vary and difagree: fome forename him C. others Cneus. Some name him M.Manlius, others Mallius or Manilius. But all this controversy is decided by an old antiquity in stone at Puteoli: the inscription whereof testifieth that P. Rutilins and Cn. Mallins were Confuls; as also the evidence of the Sicilian registers, wherein written it is Rufus and Mallius. Of this Mallius mention there is made in Cicero's Orations for Plancius and Murana: likewise in Valerius, Saluft, Tacons, Florus, Eutropius and Orofius. That he was not only a base man and of low birth but also without all vertue and wit, in the course of his life also vile and contemptible, Cicero writeth in his Oration for Plancius. Whereby it calily appeareth, that the Mallii were a kinred different from the Manlii. For of Cn. Manlius a Patritian, and that of a most noble house, Cicero would never have spoken in such terms.

650 C.Marins II. C.Flavius Fimbria.

THe next Confuls are fet down by Caffiedsrus, C. Martins the second time, and C. Flavius Fimbria: by Obsequens, C. Marins and C. Flaving. By the Sicilian registers Marins and Fimbria: by Padianus upon the Oration for Cornelius, C. Marius the second time, and C. Fimbria: Item, C. Marins and Caus Flavius. Befides, Cicero, Velleins, Valerius, Plutarch, and. others speak often of these Coss.

C.Marins III. L. Aurelius Oreftes.

Affiodorus reporteth for this years Confuls, C. Marins the third time, and L. Aurelins Orestes. The Sicilian catalogue Marins and Oreft s. Moreover, Marins even in his ablence was elected Conful the third time, for fear of the Cimbrian war which was defeated, as Velleins, Entropius, the Breviary, and Cicero in his Oration concerning Provinces, do testify,

C. Marius IV. Q. Lucatius.

NExt after them are put downfor Confuls by C. flodorus and Obsquers, C. Mertische fourth time, and Q. Luciums. The Sicilian registers exhibit unto us Mari sand Carulus. Plutarch and Entropius, Catus Marties the fourth time, and Q. Lutatins Catelus, Ofthele Confuls, Cicero and Pliny oftentimes make men-653

C.Mariu.V. M'. Aquilim.

"Hen succeeded in the Consulship by the I teltimony of Caffiodorus C. Marius the fit time and M'. Aquilens. Of this C. Marsus five times now Con.ul, Plutarch and Florus give report. And Greere in his fecond book of a perfect Orator, nameth M'. Aguil is for the compinion of C. Marin in his fift contuiship Of whom Plocarch in Marius peaketh and calleth him udvi@ aniAni as allo appian in Michridrica. Now this Manus Agust sa Consular man is the same who afterwards being an Emb flador, was by King Mathred res taken prifoper and most villanously tormented and mangled.

654 C.Marine VI. L.V. lerim Flaccus.

C Affiodorus and Obsequens shew unto us for this years onfuls, C. M rim the fixt time, and Lu. Val rem I rom. The Sicilian re. ords, M rous and Flacens. This L. Fl com (afterwords Cenfor) was Prefident of the Senat and matier of the horsemen under Syll Dictator. O thefe con uls Geere fpeaketh very often and namely, in his Brutus, in his oration for R. birise, against Caul ne and Autonie; and also in the defence of Plincing, Pliny likewise in his second book V. Il in, and Padiants upon the oration against Pefo. Moreover, Plut web, and many authors helides. In this year (upon the swelith day of July, then called Quintilus, as Macrobius witnesseth) was . Cafar born, who afterwards was furnamed D Etator.

M. Antonius. A. Post mius.

REported it is by Caffindors and Obsequents, that M. Antonius and A. Postumen were Contuls this year. The Sicilian registers, shew Albinus and Antoniss. In a fragment also of the capitol marbles, mention there is of An. Postumin, Cuspinians book and the Greek records, have A contes and Albinus, Of their Confuls, icero speaketh in his oration to the citizens of Rome, after his return out of exile. Likewife, Pliny in his 8 book and 7 chap, where he noterh this the 655 year. Alio Gellins in his 4 book and 6 chapt.

> T.Didius. Q. Metellus.

U mins Merellus and T. Didins succeeded Consuls next in this year, as Caffiodorus and Obsequens do write. And Padenus upon the oration for Cornelius, nameth them: Curio (faith he) accused Q. Metellas Nepes, ion of Balearinus, and nephew of Macedon cus, who was Conful with 7 Didies. Cicero speaketh of the fame man in his oration after his return.

Not only Cassiodorus, but the Sicilian regitiers allo, do tellify, that (n. Lemul sand P. Crassus were Consuls this year: and Obsequens nameth them, Cn. Cornelius and P. Licimus. Pliny writeth of them in his tenth book and first chapt, also in his 33 book and second 658 Cn. Domitius. C. Collius.

His year had for Confuls, Cn. Domitius and C. (assus, as Cuss. do not observe as Cuss.) witness. Cufpeni ins annals and the Greek regifiers thew Enobarbus and Longi s, A fragment o Ver. Fl cous his marbies . Enotarbus and C. Caffins fon of Incins, Pagianns speaketh of them upon the oration for Cornelius.

> Q.Scavola. L. Craffus.

Urius Crassus and Q. Scavila were consuls next following according to Cafrodorus and Obleque . In a fragment of the capitol records as touching (onfuls, is to be feen Craffus and M tius. In Cenforinus, we find Lu. Licinius fon of Lucius Cocero in his Bruius writeth, that Craffus the orator bare ali dignities of magistracy, together with Scavola the high-prieft, except the Tribunat of commons and the Cenforship: also that whiles they two were Confuls, Q. Hortenfins pleaded the first cause that ever he undertook at the bar. Padianus upon the oration of Cicero for Cornelius, maketh mention of L. Licinus Craff is the Orator, and Q. Mutius Scavola the arch-bishop an orator bendes and a protested lawyer, both Confuls together.

> L. Domitius. G Calius.

Asiedorus and Obsequens declare for this years Confu's C. Calius and L. Dimitius. The Sicilian registers, Caldus and Anobarb s. In a capitol fragment, they are Caldus and Lu. Domitins fon of Cn. As for Caldus it is the furname of Calius. For V lleius m keth mention of one C. Caldus under Ang. ft.is In the manner Citero in his book intituled, The tuing for a Confulthip and in his oration for Mu an Alo Padianis upon be Oration for Cornelius, Again, Cicero in his Brutus, nameth them next before Herennt: 5

66.I C. Valerius Flaccus. M. Herennius.

Here are matched by Caferodorus and Obfe-I quest r confuls this year C. V derius Flaccas and M. Herennius. The Sicilian records, Flarens and Herennius A broken stone of the capitol. hath Flaccus and M. Herennius, Plinius in his 29 book and 3 chapt. Cicero also in his Oration for Murana, and in Brutus, speaketh of

C:Claudius Pulcher. M.Perpenna.

COnfuls this year, were C. Clandins Puleker, and M. re pen a. as witness Cafsiedorus and Obsequens. Likewise in a capitol broken monument and in the Si ilian register it is Pulcher and M. Perpenna. Cacero maketh mention of this Clinden as Pretor of ricily in the fourth Oration against Verres: and as Edile Curule in his fer and book of Offices. So doth Pliny in his 663 L. Martim. Sext. Inlins.

Affiodorus and Ohfequens name for confuls Cthis year, L. Martins and Sext. Jilim. The Si ilian records. Philip and (afar. Entropius and Orofins Sex. Julius Cafar, and L. Martins Philippus. A capitol fragment, Pilip and Sex. Jul m, fon of Caim, Play speaketh of them in his 2 book 8 chapt, also in the 32 book and 3 chapt. In like manner Cicero many times, and Valerius.

664 L.J. line Cafar. P. Rusilius Lupus.

A Coording to Cassindorus and O'sequens the Consuls this year were L Julius Casar, and P. Ruil us Lupus. And foit is in Padianus Velleius, and the 73 Epirome: as also in other authors who have written of the Marsian war. In a fragment of the capitoi, they are feen written, Calar, and P. Rutili fon of Rufus, In the Sicilian ecords Cafar and Lupus Gicero in his book of Divination, speaketh of them both: and in his oration for Plancius he writeth that L. Ca-(ar miffing of an Ædilefhip became a Conful.

> 665 Cn. Pompeins. L. Portius.

C Miodorne fetreth down for Confuls this year L. Porte sand Cn. Pompeius. Padianus upon the Oration for Cornelius furnamed Cu. P. repeins Stra' of and L. Porcins, Cato, The Capirol fragment shew no more but Strabo and Caro. Appins hath made mention of these confuls: so have Orofins and others that have penned the M rhan war, This Cn. Pompoint was father to that Cn. Pompe us the Great : as Appianur witnesseth, and Padian upon the Oration against Pifo.

Q. Pompeins.

C. Affodorus sheweth for this years Consuls, L. Sylla and Q. Pompesus: and the same is written in Obsequens, Velleins Entropius Oresius, Appear. Pl tarch, and others. The Sicilian records have Salla and Rusilins Salla after his vi-Gory in the civil war, would needs have himfelf furnamed Falix and therefore Padian and the avouchers of the capitol monuments, in reporting this confulat, write thus ; L. Salla, who afterwards was called Falix. The fame man in his fecond Commiship, (which appeareth upon record in the capitol) is named the fon of Lucius, and nephew of Publius, Moreover, of Q. Pompeins Rafus, Gteere maketh mention in his Brus

REported there are by Caffiodorns and the Sicilian registers for Commisthis year L. Cirma and Cn. Oftavins, App. in Villeins, and the reft, who have recorded the history of this time, name them L.Cornelius Ciana, and Cn.Oftavini, Plut arch writeth, that L. Cinna being of the adverfe faction to L. Salla, was by him made conful, upon condition that he should not cross nor stand against the proceeding of the said La. Sullas and to foon as he was entred into place of government, he began to trouble and dife quiet the present state of the common-weal, yea, and intended an action against Sulla, by the means of Virginius a Tribune of the com-mons. Howbeit Salla contemning Virginius, made an expedition against Mithridaes.

> 668 L.Cinna II. C. Marius VII.

AFterthis. were Confuls, C. Marins thefe venth time, and L. Cinna the fecond time, according to the records of Sicily, C flicturus, and those that wrote of the civil war. Plutarch faith, that Marins was the first man that was feven times conful of Rome Moreover as it is to be read in Approx, and in the Breviaties L. Cinna and C. Marius, without any lawful affembly for Election, declared themselves Consus against this year, and the very fame day that they entred into their magistracy Marins commanded Sext. Licinius a Senator, to be thrown down from the rook Tarpeia: who after he had committed many hairons crimes and one ages, ended his daies upon the Ides of January: in whole room was inbordained, L. Val. Placens, even he (# men think) who before-time was colleague to C. Marins in his fixt Copfulfhip : of whom (icere maketh mention in his Oration for his fon

L. Cinna III. Cu. Papirins. CAffedorus witnesseth that the Consuls fucceeding in this year were L. Cinna the third time, and Cn. P pirius. The Sicilian secords, have Cinna and Carbo. In the $3 Breviary it is written, that Lu. Cinna and Ca. Papirini Carbo, for two years together usurped the Consulate. Alfo in the book entituled. Of tamons persons, we read that Connamade himself Consul a fecond and third time. Orthefe Confuls Planarch speaketh in alla. Appian in Methridatica, and in the first book of civil wars.

L. Cinna IV. Cn. Papirins II.

NExt were Confuls, after Cafindorus and the Epitomift, Lu. Cinna the fourth time, and Cn. Papirins the fe cond time. Cicero in his Tukulan questions mentioneth Cinna four times Consul: fo doth Succonises in Cafer, And of Cn. Papersus Carbo twice Conful, the capitol tables do yeeld testimony. As for the Sicilian records, they put down for conful, (not without suspition of error) Carbo and Seribonius.

671 C. Norbanus.

D Efides the Sicilian tables, Caffiodorus, Obse-D quens, Appins, Entropine, Flores, and Tacites in his ninteenth book do witness, that Lu. Scipio, and C. Norbanus were Confuls. In the capitol fragments it is written, Lu. Cornelius fon of Lucius, nephew of L. Scipio Afiaticus.

M. Carine Cn. Carbo III.

I Find in Cassiodorus, Appianus, Velleius, and others, the next confuls to have been, C. Marim and Cn. Carbo the third time. This C. Marim was the brothers fon of C. Marine feven times conful, according to Appian: but Velleim, Paterculus, Plutarch, Entropius, and others, fay, that he was the ion of that C. Marius : and haply indeed he was adopted by C. Marine. Certainly, in the capitol tables, he is called C. Marin, ion of C. and nephew of Cain. Cicero speaketh of these Cost, against Rullus: Pliny also in his 17 book, and they who have let down in writing the civil wars of Sylla.

673 M'.Tulling, Cn, Dolabella.

NExt to those, Caffiodorm bringeth in for confuls, M. Tulline and Cn. Dolabella. The Sicilian records, have Decula and Dolabella, Appian also reporteth, that Sylla Dictator, to the end that the state and common-weal might feem to retain some shew yet of her ancient dignity, permitted M'. Tullins and Cornelius Dolabella to be created confuls, whiles himfelf after the manner of K. fate aloft in a throne above them. Cicero in his oration against Rullus, and Gellius in his 15 book and 33 chap, maketh mention of M'. Tullius and Cn. Cornelius confuls. In a capitol fragment, this M'. Tullius, son of M. nephew of A. is furnamed Decula.

L. Sylla II. Q. Metellus.

CAffodorus and the Sicilian registers, set down for Confuls, Lu. Sylla the second time, and Q. Metellus. Appius faith moreover, that Sylla, Dictaror though he was, yet flood content and willing to be declared conful with Q. Metellus Pius, to the end that the common-weal might seem to have some likeness yet of a free state. Of these confuls, Cicero maketh mention in his Orations against Verres, and elsewhere. Gellins likewise in his 1 5 book and 28 chapter, together with Cassiodorus. This Metellus was inrnamed Pins. He it is, who was by lot appointed to manage the wars in Spain and against Seriorius; and son he was to Namidicus,

P. Servilius. App. Claudius.

He next confuls, were P. Servilius and Ap. Claudius, as witnesseth Cassodorm. In the Sicilian tables, it appeareth that their furnames were. Vatia and Pulcher: of whom Appiansa writerh thus; The people of Rome in obsequious manner to court Syll 1 the Dictator, requefled of him that he would continue conful fill another year: But Sylla would none of that: and took order, that Ser. If aurious and Claudius Pulcher, should be declared Coss, In a fragment of the capitol he is thus written; Pub. Servilius Vatia, called afterwards I faurious: which furname he took of the Isaurians, a nation in Colicia whom he subdued. My authors are, Padianus upon the Orations of Cicero against Verres; Strabo in his 14 book; Margellinus likewise in his 14 book, with others.

> 676 M. Lepidus. Q. Catulus.

Mar. Lepidus and Q.Catulus, are by Cafsi-odorus named Confuls for this year. Plutarch reporteth, that when L. Sylla had given up his Dictatorship, and restored again to the people of Rome the free liberty to dispose of consular dignities in their solemn assemblies for elections; M. Lepidus an enemy to Sylla, and an audacious person, was declared Consulbefore Catulus, and had the preheminence above him, by the earnest endeavour of Cn. Pompeius. Of these Consuls, Pliny maketh mention in his 36 book, wherein he faith, that they governed in the year 676. Likewife, Cicero in his Oracion for Cornelius: Florus out of Livy: Valerius 2 book 3 chap, and Eutropius.

M. Amilius. D. Brutus.

His year had for Confuls, by the testimony I of Cassiodorus and Obsequens, M. Emylius and D. Brutus. Macer, a Tribune of the commons, speaketh of them in Salust, complaining that the commons were by the nobles oppreifed. In like fort, Cicero in Brutus, and in his fecond book of Duties, as also Valerius in the 7 book and 7 chap. This M. Emylius was furnamed Lepidus and Livianus : for out of the family of Livies he was adopted by M. Lepidus, and therefore right well he is called, fon of Ma-

> Cn. Octavius. C. Curio.

VErrim Flacens setteth down for Consuls, Cn. Ottavins son of M. nephew of C. and C. Scribonius Curio. The fame doth Cicero report in Brutus. So do Salust. Obsequens. Lattantius in his first book, and Pliny in his second book and 35 chapter. Cic, in his Brutun, and Pliny in his 7 book and 41 chapt, make report of three Cati Curions, all Orators to wit, the father, the fon, and the fons fon or nephew.

L. Octavius. C. Cotta.

C Affiodorus putteth down for confuls this year, L. Octavius and C. Cotta. Objequens, C. Aurelius and L. Octavius. Plany in his fecond book and 35 chapt. Cicero likewife in his third and fifth Orations against Verres, maketh mention of L. Octavius, and C. Aurelius confuls. Upon the broken marbles of the capitol, they fland to be feen, L. Octavius (on of Cn. nephew of Cn. and C. Aurelius. This year the Sicilian registers over-skip, Pedianus writeth, that there were at this time three Cotta's brethren, and all of confular degree, namely, Caius, Marcus, and Lucius.

680 L.Licinins Lucullus, M. Cotta.

For this years confuls, Cafisodorus registreth L. Lucult's, and M. Cotra. The Sicilian records, Lucult's, and Cotra. Entropius, Appianus in Mithratica, and Plutarch in Lucullus, nameth them, L. Licinius Lucullus, and M. Aurtlius Cotta. Mention there is made of them by Cicero againt Verres; and by Florus in the 93 and 94 Epitomes. This L. Lucullus had for his grand-father that Lucullus, who was conful with A. Albinus, as Cicero and Plutarch do teflify.

M. Lucullus. C. Cassius.

THis year (by the testimony of Cassiodorus,) had for contuls, M. Lucullus, and C. Caffisa: but the Sicilian records, nominate Marcellus and Cassius: whom Cicero in an oration against Verres, nameth M. Terentius and C.C. flus: laying that the laws Terentia and Cassia, were by them promulged. For, so far forth as we may conjecture by the capitol fragments, M. Licin'us Lucullus, was adopted by M. Terentius Varro, and therefore called M. Terentins Varro Lucullus. Cicero in Lucullus, and Plutarch, call L. Lucullus and M. Lucullus brethren, whom Eutropius nameth cofin germans by two fifters. That the lurname of Cassius was Varus, appeareth both by a conduit pipe or waterspout of lead found in Rome, and also for that Appian in his fourth book, writeth that C. Cassius Varus, a man who had been Conful, was condemned and outlawed by the Triumvirs.

L. Gell n . Cn. Lentulus.

The confuls next following, by the report of C. flodowing, were L. Gelliut and Cn. Lentu-list. In like fort Ciero maketh mention of them in his oration for Balbus, and eliewhere. Plusarchalio in Craffus, with Entropius and Orofius. Caspinians book sheweth Poplicoda and Lentus-list. Now the surmane of L. Gellius was Poplico-list, sa witnesseth Oauphrius.

Cn. Aufidius. P. Lentulus.

Affiodorus fetteth down for confuls this cilian regifers have Lemulus and Oreftes. Eutropius, C. Lemulus and Oreftes. Eutropius, C. Lemulus and Co. Aufaius Oreftes. This Co. Aufaius Oreftes, when he went befide a Tribunship of the commons, was chosen conful, as Gicero writeth in his oration for Plantius, This is that P. Lemulus furnamed Sura, who afterwards, being a man of confular calling, and who had been twice Pretor, was banged and strangled to death when Gicero was consul, for that he had conspired with Catilin: whole grand-stather was P. Lemulus President of the Senat, as Cicero saith, pleading for his house, and inveighing against Catilin: as also Faduraus.

684 M. Craffus. Cn. Pompeius.

N Ext to them were Goss. M. Crassis and Cri.

Pompeius, according to Cassisodore, Flutarch,

Appian, and the Sicilian records. Their summes for certain, were Diver and Magnus, Alithe old writers speak much of this their first Consulship. Plurarch reporteth that L. Crassis attained to the Consular dignity, by the means of Pompeius the consular Besides, Gioero, Salask, Padian writing upon the oration for Cornelius, and all other authors speak of these consuls,

Q.Metellus. Q. Hortensius.

Then followed confuls, Q. Maulin and Q. Hortensins, as Cassiciatore and the Sicilian calogue do testify. Padianns matcheth Q. Metellus Creticus with Q. Hortensius that great Orator! Likewise, Josephus in his sourceenth book of Jewish antiquities, Cicero in Bruss calleth this Q. Hortensius, the son of Lucius, Q. Metellus asterwards upon the conquest made of Creiz surnamed Creticus, was the son of L. Dalmaticus, as may be gathered out of Padianus upon the Oration of Tully [called Devinatio] against Verres.

686 [L.Metcllus. Q.Marcius.

P. Edianus writing upon Tullis Orition against Pifo: Dio likewise and Cassiodorus, join together in the consulfitip this year, L. Caccilius Mecellus, and Q. Marcius. The Greek records, Marcius Rex, and Macellus. This Matellus, Dio writeth to have died in the very beginning of his magistracy: that he also who was substituted in his room, left this life before he entred into the government: and theruponic was not thought good to subelect any more: and by that means Q. Marcius bare that dignity alone: and him Saluss entire the substitution of Rex, This L. Metellus was brother to Q. Creticus, as Padian witnesseen.

C. Pifo. M'.Glabrio.

There succeeded Consuls, C. Pife and M., Coldbria, witness Cassioner and the Sicilian records. And in Die they follow immediatly by the name of Manius Asilius and C. Pife. Cicere in his twelfth book of Episles to Assicus, speaketh of C. Pife and M. Acilius Glabrio, men of Consular place and calling. Padian in his comentaries upon the oration for Cornelius maketh mention of C. Pife and the law Calpurna by him made, as tou thing inordinate and indirect since after dignities of state. Moreover, of them Valerius in his fourth book writeth.

M. Lepidus. L. Volcatius.

CAffiodore putteth down for Confuls, Manissi Lepidaus, and with him L. Torquasus, but unturly, The Greek records have Poleatius Tullus. Dio Liu. Tullus, and Emylius Lepidus. Salufi in Casilius, L. Tullus and M. Lepidus. Padhan upon the oration for Cornelius. M. Lepidus and L. Poleatius. Ciero in his oration for Sulfa hath L. Volcatius Tullus: fo as it appeareth it should be, M. Emylius Lepidus, and L. Volcatius Tullus.

L. Cotta. L. Torquatm.

The Confuls elect, were L. Autronius Patus Last appeareth upon amonument of a tribusph in the capitol, and not Autronius, ascommonly it is read) and P. Cornelius Sullas: who being condemned for ambitious feeking after that office, and having therefore fuffered condign punishment, their accufers Reprintotheir place of government, namely L. Autrelius fon of Marcus, furnamed Catta; and Li Manius, 100 of Lucius, furnamed alto Torquaius: as tellify, Saluft, Dio, Padian upon the oration for Corndins, and that which he made in his white tobe; and lastly, Tranquistur in Cafar.

L. Cafar. C. Figulus.

The year, next enfuing had for Confuls, by the testimony of Cassicolore, Padianus, and the Sicilian records, L. Casar and C. Figutus, whom Dio calleth Lucius Cassar, and Lucius Mariius son of Caius, Jurnamed Figutus. Cicero Inhis oration for Sulla, nameth them L. Julius and C. Figutus: 16 doth Salust in Catilina. This L. Julius Casar is his fon who was Consul in the Massian war.

M. Cicero. C. Antonius.

The this year, were M. Tulliss fon of M. Tulliss fon of M. as teltity Dio in his feven and thirtieth book. Cafflodore, Salufi in his Catilinary oration, Velleurs in his fecond book, Joseph in his Jewish antiquities 14 book 8 chapter. Play ith his eight book and three and fiftieth chapter, Tranquillus in the life of A gustus, Appian, Eutropius, Padian, and others.

D. Silanus. L. Mutana,

THere followed confuls next, D. Silania, and L. Murana, as Cassiodorus, Salust, and the Sicilian records do witness. Dio calleth them D. Junius fon of M. furnamed Silanus and L. Licinius fon of L. furnamed Murana. Entropius nameth them D. Junius Silanns, and L. Liginius, fon of that L. Murana who in quality of Pro-pretor triumphed over Mithridates (as Cicero faith) pleading for Murana himself, being accused and in trouble for unlawful seeking to be Cof. In this affembly for election of Cof. L. Sergius Catilina suffered the second repulse: for anger whereof, in a melancholy he brake out into a conspiracy, and practised against the state; and likewise Servius Sulpitine Rufus the lawyer, who afterwards accused Murana for the crime aforefaid.

M. Pupins. M. Valerius.

Affiodorus fetteth down for Confuls this year, M. Pupius and M. Valerius, The Siciliantegifters, Pijo and M. Pupius, fon of M. furnamed Pijo: and M. Valerius fon of M. furnamed Meffala Niger. Of this M. flod Niger, there is also mention made by Padian upon the oration for Scannus, Also of M. Meffala and M. Pijo, in Plinies seventh book, and its and twentieth chapter, seven and thirtieth book, cap. second, and the eight book of the foods and twenty. And in Casars first book of the Gauls war. Of M. Pijo Pedian likewise speaker writing upon the oration against Pijo.

Q. Metellus. Q. Afranius.

CAffiodorus and the Sicilian registers nominate for this years Consuls, Q. Metellus and L. Africanus. The like doth Obsequent and Cicroin his firth book of Epithles to, Asticus, Dio nameth them L. Afranius son of L. and Q. Cacilius, son of Q. curnamed Metellus Celer. Both of them were advanced to the Consulate (as. Dio withesselfeth) by the means of Pompeius, forthey had been both twain his Lieutenants serving under him in Afja.

695 C.Cafar, M.Bibulus.

CAssiodorus, Suetonius, together with the Sicilian tables and the Breviaries, do match together for consults this year, C. Casar and M. Bibulus. Dio, C. Julius son of C. Casar, and M. Calpurnius. Plutarch and Appray. C. Pulius Casar, and C. Bibulus. Albeit Appian as also Emtropius and Orofius give Bibulus the forename of Lucius, Of Casar and Bibulus, Cicero speaketh in his firth book of Epitles, writing to Lennulus.

C Affiodorus and the Sicilian records shew for Consuls this year, L. Pife and A. Gabinius. Dio, L. Calpurnius fon of L. Pifo: and A. Gabinius fon of Aulus, Cafar, Cicero, Plutarch, and Caffiodorus, L. Polo, and A. Gabinius, Cafar writeth of them in his first book of the Gauls war, and Plutarch in the life of Cato the yonger, Cacero also in his oration against Pelo and for Sextius. This Pife the Conful Cicero and Padian furnamed Casonius, for so his grand-father before him was called as appeareth in the capitol records for the year 606.

> P. Lenenlus. Q. Metellus.

He Confuls following for this year, were by Caffiodorus and the Sicilian records, P. Lentulus and Q. Metellus. By Dio, Pub. Corneliusion of Publius, Lentulus Spinther: and Q.Cacilius ion of Qu. Metellus Nepos. Of them ipeaketh Valerius in his ninth book. Lentulus (qd. he) and Meselles companions in the confulthip were beheld and seen both upon the stage like plaiers: but the one of them took the furname * Steundarum. of Spinther * one of the fecondifort of actors: the other, but that he had gotten the name of Nepos already for his lewd behaviour, should have been called Pamphilus, after the name of * one of a third fort, whom for all the world he relembled. Of the same men, Cicero in his fiest book of Epittles, and in very many of his orations. Plany also in his seventh book and second chapter, Plutarch in the life of Cicero, and all other writers make much mention.

698 . Cn. Lentulus. L. Philippus.

CAssiodarus puterh down for Consuls, Cn. Lemulus and L. Phil ppns. The Sicilian records, Marcellus and Ph lippins, Die, Cn. Cornelius fon of Publius, Lentulus Marcellus: and L.Martius fon of Lucius Philippus. Of Lentulus and M. Marceline Confuls, Cicero speaketh in his Bpiftles to Lemulus. Plutarch also in thelife of Cate. maketh mention of Martins Philippes now Conful. This Cn. Lentulus was the fon of that P. Lentulus, as Cicero faith in his Brutus. And furnamed he was Marcellus, and not Claur diss, that it might be known of what family of the Claudii he was descended.

> 696 Cn. Pampeins. M. Craffus.

WHen as by the obstinate persistance of C. Cate Tribun of the commons, (who ever interpoled his negative) there could be no ordinary affembly holden for the creation of magiffrats the whole degree of the Senators changed their weed in token ofgrief: fo as upon an Interregency between, Cn. Domitius Enobarbus, and Appius Claudius Pulcher. Of this L. Domisius, ion of Cneus Ensbarbus, Calius speaketh in the eight book of Ciceros Epistles.

> M. Melfala. Cn. Domitius.

A Gainst this year there stood in election and laboured with much earnestnes and ambitions defire to be Confuls, Cains Memmius, Cn. Domitius. M. Miffala and M. Scaurut, as Cicero writeth to his brother Quintus. But at the last, even in the seventh month of this year there were created by means of an Interregen-Cy. M. Meffala and Cn. Domitius. Neither had they been chosen then; but that Q. Pompeins Rufus a Tribut of the commons, who fill opposed himself to hinder and debar all elections was by order from the Senate committed: and the Senate made countenance to do the like by the reft, as many as went about to cross the said election. Thus much Dio. But Appian faith that the common-weal continued for eight months space in Anarchy without any soveraign magifirsts of flate. Plutareh writerh, that inthis fo great extremity of danger, Lucilius a Tribun of the commons, preferred a bill for the creating of Cneus Pempesus Dictator, who should redreis all enormities and fer upright the state again: but Cate gainfaid it, and fo nothing was effected. Die faith moreover that the Tribuns of the commons moved for the chung not of a Di-Cator only, but also of military Tribuns in consuls authority: but through the earnest labour of Pompeius, Confuls were created, Meffala and Calvinus, which furnames stand to be feen upon the Sicilian records, Alfo in the cas pitol monuments, written it is thus. When by reason of the contentions among to mighty competitors the Confuls could not be created by the Calends of 7amuary: there passed an Act of the Senat, according to the mind and advice of Bibulus, by yerthe whereof Cn. Pompeins was by the Interregent Serv. Sulpitius created Conful the third time, upon the five and twentieth of February, without a Collegue first, and presently entred upon the government, But afterwards to avoid the envy that might arise thereupon, he took unto him as companion in the Confulship for the five last months of the year behind, Q Ca. cilius Pine Metellus Scipio, his Wives father. Thus writeth Padian upon the Oration of Cicero in defence of Milo: Plurarch likewife, Appianus and Die. This Metellus Pius Scipio Was also called P. Cornelius Scipio Nafica, son of Nafica Scipio, who being adopted by Q. Metellus Pine, is called by Calin in the familiar Epiftles of Girero; Q. Cacilism fon of Q. nephew of Q. Metellus Pius Scipio.

Hen Caius Cafar the Dictator held the folemn affembly for the election in the latter end of the former year, Confuls there were created Cains Julius, fon of Cains Cafar; and Pub Servilius, son of Publius Isauricus, For now was the year come, when as Cafir by the laws might be chosen Consult for so in the third book of his own Commentaries he faith himself, and so Dio in his one and sortieth book, Plutarch, Tranquillus, Appianus, and Caffindorus do testifie of him. But he meaneth that law which expresly forbad and debarred, that no man might be within ten years space chofen Cof. twice. Now Cafare albeit he was without Italy, immediatly entred upon his Dictatorship, having sub-ordained under him for his Generall of the horse, Mar-Antonius, a man who yet had not been Prator This appeareth by the Capitoll records, Dio, Plutarch, and Cleero in his fecond Philippica: But under what pretence and colour Cafar took upon him this Dictatorship and the rest following, Marcus Antonius sheweth in his Oration of Cafars praise in Dio: wherein he faith, that Cafar was created Dictator to make of this creation. Bus certain it is that Cafar he might draw unto himfelf alone the whole "managing and government of the State, which beforetime had been administred by many perfors. Howbeit, in the end of the year, after the recovery and conquest of Egypt, when King Prolomem was flain, and Pharnaces K. of Pontus vanquished; Confuls were created, Q. But Onuphrim supposeth that both Tranquillus and Dio,yea, and Hirrins also was in an errour. For with the capitoll records, Plut arch and Eutropius agree; who write that Cafar this year was Conful the third time with M. Lepidus, and Dictator the second time.

unto us that Cafar this year was third time Distator with M. Lepidus General of the horse. From whom Dio differeth; who doth report that this year Cafar was Dictator the 4 time, and Lepidus second time Master of the horiemen: also that Lepidusfellow-Consul with Cafar, declareth himselfagainst all law, Generall of the horse. Thus much of the Dictator. But as touching the Consuls this year, there is to be feen written in the Index or table of Dio, that the same year Cafar bare his fourth Dictatorship, and likewise his fourth Consulat without Collegue. In that history also it appeareth, that Cafar presently entred upon his fourth Consulat, but bare it not throughout the whole year: and that so soon as he was returned to Rome out of Spain, he refigned and substituted in his place for the rest of the year, Q. Fabius Maximus, and Cn. Trebonius. With Dio, the evidences agree that are written in the capitoll fragments: wherein it appeareth that Ca-far was the fourth time Conful, and that without a Collegue; as Sigonius maketh interpretation, For Culpinians Kalender, together with the Sicilian registers, do shew that Cafar was Conful now alone the fourth time. In like manner, Appian and Plutareh make mention of Cafar, who being Conful elect from the fourth time led an army into Spain, As tor Q. Fabius, Suetonius calleth him a three months Conful. Die faith moreover, that Cafar upon the death of Q. Fabins the Conful, declared the very last day of the year, C. Cannius to be the Conful for those few hours that were behind Whereof Cicero in his feventh book of Epifiles. writing to Curius, Macrobius in his fecond book of Saturnalia, Tacitus in his eighteenth book, Pliny in his feventh, and Suctionins in Cafar do make report.

C.Cafar. M. Antonius.

Die letteth down for this year Cafar Dida: tor the fift time, together with M. Emtius Lepidus Mafter of the horsemen, But the capitoll tables avouch him Dictator now the fourth time. Die and Appian write that he created himself Consul together with M. Antonius. Likewise Caffiodorus and the Sicilian regifters give record, that Cafar was this year Conful the fift time, together with M. Amemus. And Macrobius in his first book speaketh of them, Moreover, written it is in the capitoll and Colotian tables, that C. Cafar was Col. the fift time, with M. Antonius fon of M. and that in the room of Cafar there was chosen P Cornelius fon of Publius. And this was P. Cornelius Dolabella, whom Cafar himself (if he had lived) meant to have substituted in his own room, Plutarch writeth, that Cafar Confulnow the fift time took unto him for his companion in government M. Antonius. And when as he would have subordained Dolabellain his own Read, Ant ony gainfaid it in an oration: and afterwards, when Cafar a fecond time would have Hey who cut the capitol marbles, do fhew i, had Dolabella to be declared Conful, and fill Antony croffed and withflood it, Cafar gave over his enterprise. But after Cafar was murdered, Antony (as Dio writeth) fearing fome inforrection and commotion if he should have rejeced Dolabella, took him into the fellowship of government. Appian faith, that immediatly after Cafar was killed, Dolabella entred into the Magistracy. So saith Velleius also. And this verily was the year, in which the conspiracy was contrived against Cafar, whereof the captains were M and Decimus both Bruti, c. Trebonius & C. Caffius : and upon the fifteenth day of March, when he fat in Councill together with the Senat in the court of Polupey, he was was stabbed, and received in his body three and twenty wounds : which done, the murderers who had wrought the feat feized the capitoll, And c. Oftavins his nephew or fifters fon. whom cafar had made in his will his half-heir, and adopted to bear his own name, came out of Epirus, whither cafar had fent him before, minding to make war upon the Parthians, and after all lucky and happy proceedings, took upon him the name of cafar, according to his last will and testament.

C.Panfa. A.Hirtim.

Dio Caffiedorus, and the rest, nominate Con-fuls for this year, C. Vibius Pansa Capronianus, and A. Hirtins, fon of Aulus, Cuffinions book sheweth Cretonianus and Hirtius. Whereby it may be understood, that Cretonianies was the furname of Panfa, but peradventure written for Capronianus. In the Colotian table they are named C. Vibius, son of Cains, and Au. Hirtitius fon of Hirtius. This Hirtius was one of their fons who were our-lawed by Sulla, and whom Cafar (as Dio reporteth) advanced to honourable dignities. Both these, and the Consuls of the year following, were by Cafar elected and deflined thereto, before he was flain, Dio, Appiane and others report, that of their two Confuls, Hirtius in the time of the civill war, in a battell before Modena. against Antonius was flain; and Pansasome daies after, upon a hurt received in the same fight, died at Bononia. In the room of Panfa, C. Ottavius was sub-elected Conful, the nineteenth of August in the same year, and he instead of Hirtins, took unto him for his Collegue Q. Padins.

M.Lapidus. L. Plancus.

Affiodorus and the Sicilian records put down for Coniuls, M. Lepidus and L. Plancus. Dio, M. Emylius Lepidus the second time, and En. Munatins, fon of Lucius, furnamed Plancuis Of these Confuls Suctonius speaketh in Tiberius, faying, That Tiberius was born after the battell of Philippi, when Mar. Emylius Lepidus was the fecond time Conful with Munatius Planeus. Now had there been before appointed Consuls against this year by Casar, D. Brutus and Lu. Planeus. But by reason that Brutus the year before was by the law Pedia condemned and afterkilled, and so the three Triumvirs ufurped the mile of the common-weal; agreed it was, that Mi Lepidus one of the Triumvirs who beforetime also had been Conful with Cafar in his third Coufulship, should together with Plancus, (who also taking part and siding with Antony had revoked from the Common-weal) administer the Consulat. Moreover, this Brutus was by Plutarch, Appian, Dio, and Zonaras. called alfo Albinus; I suppose, for that out of the race of the Bruti he was adopted and incorporat into the house of the Albini. In this year, during the civill war, Brutus and Cafsine were flain in battell before Philippi, as Dio, Plutareh, Appian, and others write.

P. Servilius II. L. Antonius.

The Colotian cables, Dio, and Coffindorse, match Confuls rogether for this year, Lie. Antenins fon of Marcus, furnamed Pigras, and P. Servilius fon of Publius, I Junious, the fecond time. Of these Confids, Suctioning writerh in Tiberius. This P . Servitius was fieft Conful with Cefar in his fecond Confinat; whole father Ifauricus died a little before, as Dio and Eufebius report. As for L. Antonius, named he is by Die Pietas for that being Conful, he together with Fulvia the wife of his brother Marcus managed the affairs of flate with that mind, as if his whole care had been for his brother the Triumvir, in regard of which brotherly and affectionat kindness, he challenged the surname of Pies

Cn. Domitius, C. Asinius,

A Colonian table, Dio, and Cassiodores joyn in the Consular of this year, Cneus Damitius fon of Marcus, Calvinus, the fecond time; and C. Afinius, fon of Cheus, Pollio. Of thefe, Jofephus speaketh in his fourteenth book of the lews antiquities and three and twenty chapter. Toward the end of this year, Die writeth, that these Consuls gave up their place, and that other Confuls were substitute for those few daies that were to come : and one of them was L. Cornelius Balbus Gaditanus. And therefore in the Colotian table these subordained Consuls fland under these names, L. Cornelius, son of Lucius, and P. Canidius, fon of Lucius. Of Pub. Connel. Balbus Conful, Pliny writeth in his feventh. book and three and fortieth chapter, and Velleins in his second book.

L.Cenforinus. L.Calvifius. Assiodorus inferred for the next Confuls. Lucius Cenforinus and Cains Calvifins. The Sicilian records have Cenforinus and Sabinus. Dio, L. Martius and C. Sabinus, C. Calvisius ion of Caius, is named by Dio in the catalogue or table, Sabinus, although it be read there commonly but amifs, Afinius, 716 Ap.Clandius. C.Norbanus.

Onfuls that follow, were App. Claudius and C. Norbanus, as Caffiodorus saith. M. Agrippa. L. Caninius. Affiodorns putteth down for Confuls, M. Agrippa and Lu. Caninius. The Sicilian regiflers Agrippa and Gallus Dio, M. Vipfanius, fon of Lucius, Agrippa: and L. Caninius fon of Lucius, Gallis. Josephus in his fifteenth book of Antiquities, avoucheth Confuls, Mar. Agrippa and C. Canidius Gallus. Alepos also in the life of Articus, calleth Vipfanius. Agrippa. In the capitol his gentile name is passed over, and namely, in theforefront of the Temple, called Pantheon, wherein is engraven M. Agrippa son of Lucius, Consul the third time. Tacius also in his fift book mentioneth this Agrippa.

718 L.Gellius. M.Cooccius.

Affiodorus nameth for Consuls this year, L. Gellins and M. Cocceins. The Sicilian records frew Publicola and Nerva: Dio hath Lu. Gellius fon of Lucius Poplicola, and M. Cocceius Nerva. Out of the capitoll fragments it appeareth, that L. Gellins was the fon of Lucius, and nephew of Lucius. By the report of Dio, this Lu. Gellius was brother to M. Valerius Meffala. For it is the same man who was pardoned before by M. Brutus: whereby it may be understood, that Poplicola was his furname by way of adoption : for they were not the Gellis but the Valerii, that carried the furname of Publicole. The same tragments do shew, that the said Gellius lest his place, and that another was put in his room. And haply it was L. Munatins, ion of Lucius, nephew of Lucius Plancus: whom Pliny in his thirteenth book and third chapter, faith to have been twice Consul: but in what year he was the second time,a man cannot find,unless it were in this.

Sext Pompeius. L.Cornificius.

Affiodorss and the Sicilian records testifie, Cthat this years Confuls were Sex. Pompeius and L. Cornificius Dio L. Cornificius (on of Lueius, and Sextus Pempeius fon of Sextus. This year Sex. Pempeius, son of Cneus was flain.

M. Antonius. L. Scribonius Libo.

Affiodorus putteth down for Confuls, Lu. Scribonius and Lu. Atratinus. The Sicilian gatalogue Antonius and Libo. Dio, M. Antonius fon of Marcus the second time, and L. Scribenius, fon of Lucius, Libo. The fame Dio fairh moreover, that M. Antonius the Triumvir, presently upon the very Calends of January gave over the Magistracy, and substituted in his own sead Lu. Sempronius Atratinus : and therefore many there be that affirm how it was not Amonius but Atratinus that was Conful this year with Libo. That Consuls also were sub-elected to bear out one part of the year, it is to be found in some authors that have set forth the Municipal Annals, And verily Dio maketh mention of Paulus Emylius Conful, for one part of the · year, and that he built a stately porch or gallery at his own charges, and dedicated it in his Confulthip.

G.Cafar. L.Volcatius.

Affiodorus exhibiteth unto us for Confuls, G. Cafar and L. Volcatius. Die, Cafar the

They who composed and digested the Sicilian registers, very unfiely fet down Cafar and Cicere for this years Confuls, Of this Confulfhip of Cafar, Suctionius and Dio speak, faying, that he held it very few hours, as Antonius allo beforetime. Initead of Cefar was Lu. Antonius Inbrogated, and many other for one part or other of the year, who in the book entituled, Old inscriptions, are reckoned in this manner:

Cn. Domitius. C.Sofius.

Assiedorus nominateth for Consuls this _year, Cn. Domitius and C. Sofius. The Sicilian records, Enobarbus and Sofins, Dio Cneus Domitins, fon of Cnews, nephew of Cnews, Enobarbus; and C. Sofius fon of C. nephew of Caim, Nepos writeth, that Attions died, when Cn. Domitins and C. Sofins were Confuls.

723 C.Cafar II. M.Messala.

Affiodorus avoucheth Consuls this yest, C.

Casar the second time, and M. Melida. The Sicilian registers, Oftavius and Corvinus. Dio Cafar the third time, and M. Valerius, fon of Marcus, furnamed Meffala Corvinus, and that right truly. For Caffiodorus makethno reckoning of that Confulfhip of Cafar which he bate with Pedius, because he was subordained in the place with another. But Dio and Appins do witness, that Cafar and Antony were marched together this year, both of them in their second Consulship, at what time as upon peace made with Sextus Pompeius, they were appointed Confuls beforehand for eight years nextenfuing : howbeit, in the first year the people turned Antony out of his Consulthip, and proclaimed war against him and Cleopatra, and so in his place was Mar. Messala declared Consul. As touching the Confuls this year subordained, thus we find written in the ancient infriptions.

For he had been Conful firlt, for a part of the year, anno 727, and now is the second time: of whom Sheronius writeth thus in Nero , Nero tookato wife Statilia Meffalind, daughter (in the fourth descent) of Tauras, one who had been twice Confuk and also triumphant : he writeth allow that Augustus entred upon his eight and ninth Confulat at Tarracon,

c) cafar Augustins VIII; M. Silannis.

Affiodorus the weth for Confuls next, Cafar Augustus the eighth time, and M. Silanus, Dio and the Sicilian records, Augustus the ninth time and M. Silanus. A fragment of the capitol, Emperour Cafar Augustus the ninth time, and M. Junius Silanus This year Augustus Cafar was Emperour the eight time, and shut up the Temple of Janus the fourth time now that ever it was thut : which he had fet open before in regard of certain wars as Dio reporteth.

C. Cafur Augustus IX. C. Norbanus,

Affiodorus putteth down for this years Goniuls, Cafar Augustus the ninth time, Affiodorus declareth for Confuls this year, and C. Norbanus. The Sicilian registers, Augufus the tenth time, and Flaceus. Dio, and a fragment of the capitoll marble, Augustus the tenth time, and C. Norbanus Flaccus. This Norbanus feemeth to be the fon of C. Norbanus the Conful, anno 716, for he had not the numerall note testifying a fecond Consulship,

C.Cafar Augustus X. Cn.Pifo.

Affiodorus setteth down for Consuls, Ca-Jar Augustus the tenth time, and Creut Pi-fo: The Sicilian records, Augustus the eleventh time, and Pifo. And Dio, Augustus the eleventh time, with Cn. Calpurnius, fon of Cheus Pife, By a fragment of the capitol from it appeareth that Augustus entered the Consulship the eleventh time together with Anlus Terentius Varro Murana: also that Murana died in his Magistracy, in whose stead was elected Cn. Calpurnius Pifo; and Augustus went out of his government. Of which matter Dio thus writeth; Augustus went to the Alban hill, and there religited up Yyyy 3 the Confulthip. For whereas both he himself and many others, ever since the time that the C.W. was set in frame and established, had born the yearly Magistrats, he thought that from themes forwards he was to forbear the same, to the end, that the honourable dignity of Consuls should be open to as many as might be. And this did he without the City, because he would not be hindred and letted in the astion; and therewith substituted in his place Lucius Sessius, a man that of all others most affected and loved Brusu: who also wrote of his praises and commendable parts.

M.Marcellm. L, Aruntins.

This year had for Confuls, as faith Caffiodorus, M. Marchine and L. Aruntius; as Dus, M. Clandius ion of Marcus Marcellus, and Actensions fon of Lucius. In the Capitoll stone thele Confuls are thus fet down, L. Aruntius fon of L. nephew of L. and M. Clauduss son of Marcus, nephew of M. Whereby it is given to understand, that in the Sicilian records the Confuls are not well put down to be Ottavianus the twells time, and Aruntius, In this year, the confpiracy of Fannius Capio and Varra Murana against Augustus was discovered: and the Temple of thundering Jupitar was dedicated, witness Dio.

M. Lollins. Q. Lepidus.

Telle Colotian stone and Cassiodarus shew for this year Consuls, Q. Emplus Lepidus and M. Laslius, Dio written, when Augustus Lepidus in Sicily, and the people of Romes at the assembly for Consuls election, there arose a sedition and commotion. For M. Laslius only entred upon the government, by reason that the other place was reserved and kept for Augustus; but when he made resultable. Q. Lepidus was created, Of these Consuls Horace in his first book of Epittles written thus:

Me quater undenos sciat implevisse Decembres, Collegam Lepidum que dixis Lollius anne.

Know he, that 40 winters old and four, I was that year, At Rome when Conful Lolling, choic Lepidus his feer.

M. Apuleins. P. Silius.

Feer Caffiodorses, the Confuls that followed for this year, were M. Appleius and P. S. lius. But in Dio. M. Appleius ion of Sexturand Publius Silius fon of Publius Nerva. In the Sicilian records, Appleius and Nerva.

C. Sentius. 735 Q. Lucretius.

The Colotian flone, Enfebius in his treatife of Times, Dio and Cofficulorus fet forth as Confuls this year, Cains Sentins, fon of Cains, Saturnians; and Quintus Lucretins fon of Quintas Vifillo. Of this years confuls thus writeth Die, Cains Sentius was declared Conful: bur for that there was to be given him a companion, and Augustus refused the second place of Confulfhip reserved for him, there arole a fedition, untill Augustus pronounced Conful Quintus Lucretius one of the Embaffadors. whom the Senat had fent unto him about the appearing of the forefaid tedition; not withflanding he was a man in times past proferibed and outlawed. The fame writeth Welleins in the fecond book. In the broken Colotian flone it isto be read, that the Conful elected inflead of Sentins Saturninus, Was Man Vinucius fon of Marcus. Velleins, unto Vinneins adjoyneth as Collegue, Agrippa. In this year, after the first ten years were expired, for which space Angustus together with Agrippa at the first received the Centorian authority and dignity, he wascreated a second time by the people over-seer of mens behaviour for the term of five years; and refumed the Cenfors power for the fametime. and the Confular authority for ever. So as, at all times and in all places, he might have twelve Lictors go before him with their bundles of rods, and be allowed to take his place and fa with the Confuls.

736 Cu, Lentulus, P, Lentulus,

PM'lins Cornelius fon of Publius, Leniulai Marcelliums: and Cn. Cornelius fon oi Lucius, are fet down for Confuls by the Colorian fronc table; by Die alio and Cafliodorus, Inthis, year Marcus Agrippa by the motion and authority of the Emperour Cafar Augustus, obtained of the Senat and people of Rome the Tribunitian power for five years.

737 C.Furnius, C.Silanus,

There succeeded Consuls next, according to Cassisons, C. Furnius and C. Silanus, Aster Dies, C. Furnius son of C. and C. Junius son Cains Silanus, But in the Colorian fragment C. Furnius son of Cains, and c. Junius, Whiles G. Furnius and c. Junius Silanus were Consultate solution plaies, called Seculares were now the site time let out by Augustus, as Gensorius and Dieastium.

738 P.Scipio.

Affindere nameth for Confuls, Lucius Demiotius and P. Scipie; The Sicilian records, Enobarbus and Cornelius; Dio, L. Domitius fon of Lacius, pephew of Lucius; «Enobar bus: and P. Cornelius fon of P. nephew of Publins, Scipio: In like manner the Colosian table, wherein it Randeth, that for P. cornelius there was substituted L. T.a. i.e. Torius: of whom Pliny in his eighteenth book and seventh chapter which thus, L. Taring Rusus, a man most base to this parentage, deferred a Confulat under Anguiface Cafer, of happy memory, only for his military fervice. In this Confuls year was the Quinquential folematry performed, as writerh Die, in ammorial of the Empire of Anguiface and Agripps one of the Quindecenvirs, had the ordering and fetting out thereof.

M. Drufus. L.Pifo.

The Confuls nextfollowing, weite M. Drufue and L. Pifo, as Caffodorus faith. The Sicilian registers name them Libo and Pifo. Dio, M. Legium son of Lucius, Drufus Libo: and L. Calphyrnius son of Lucius Pifo, M. Drufus son of Marcus. Line according to the Colotian fragments.

Cn. Lentulus. M. Crassus.

This year next tollowing had for Confuls, after Calledorus, and the Sicilian monments, C. Levaulus and M. civaffars whom Dio calleth, M. Liemins fon of Marcus, C. J. and C. Cornsteadon of Cache Learning, The Colories fragment heweth Marcus Livinius fon of Marcus.

T. Novo. Q. Quintilius

Tiberius Nero, and P. Quinsilius were Confuls this year, as Caffodorus reporteth. They are named Nero and Varue in the Sicilian Catalogue. And Die calleth them Tims Claudius son of Tiberius Nero: and P. Quintilius, son of Sextus Varue, The Colotian fragment, Tiberius Candius son of T. Suetonius writeth, that Tiberius bare his first Confulship but a few daies. For this is that Tiberius Nero, Angustus Cafars wives son, who after the death of Augustus attained to the Empire, having been first by him adopted.

M. Mesala. P. Sulpitius.

Affiodor us putteth down for Confuls, Meffala and P. Sulpitius. The Sicilian records, Meffala and Quirings. Die, M. Valerius, ion of Marcus, Meffala Barbains and P. Sulpitius fon of Publins Quirinus: of whom Suctenius in Claudius, and Tacipus in his fecond book write. Moreover, this is that Sulpitius Quirinus, who by Josephus in the seventeenth book of antiquities and first chapter, is faid to have born the Confular dignity and was Lieusenant in Syria; At which time, our Lord Jefus Christ the Redeemer and Saviour of mankind, was born : of whom Saint Luke maketh mention, saying, This was the first enrolment or taxation which was made by Quirinus President and governous of Syria, After these Confuls, others were subftituted in their place, as the Colotian ftone heweth, wherein it is thus read:

M. Valerius, M.F. C.Volgine C.F. Suff. C. Caninins

Likewise in Cuspinian his Calender, these Con-

By which it appeareth that Rebutus and Saturwinus were the furnismes of Caminins & Valeius, By a fragment of the capitoell marble, it is evident, that the furnames of Valeius was a Emplianus; of Valeius, Rafus; and Rebutus of Caminius: and that as Rufus was put in the place of Valeius, to Rebutus inflead of Rufus. There remainers also the memorial of Rebutus and Sasurvinus in the Sicilian records, in this year, Die reporteth, that Anaylorus was a fecond time made over-feer for mens manners and demeanous five years more: and that he retinued fill the fame authority by times, as also the Empire, and therein Agrippa died.

P.Fabius. Q. Ælius.

Affiedarus exhibiteth for this years Gonglis, Panlus Fabius and Q. Elius, Dion, Panlus Fabius, fon of Quintus Adaximus and Tubero, Of Q. Elius Tubero, and P. Fabius Maxamus and Season of water-consluis: and Pliny inhis eight book and seventh chapter, where he written, that the Theater of Marcellus was dedicated when Quintus Tubero and Fabius Max. were Consolis.

Julus Antonius. Q. Fabius.

Affodorus nameth for Confuls this year, Junius Antonius Africanus and Q. Fabius, Dio Jul. Antonius Africanus and Q. Fabius fon of Quintus Maximus. The Sicilian Catalogie and Calender of Cuspinian thew Africanus and Maximus. Dio pameth Julyanthe lon of Antonio us, Unto him Horace writeth in this mander to 745 Drufus Nero. Titus Quintius.

Here succeeded Cost, according to Cassiodorus, Drufus Nero, and T. Quintius: but after Dio, Nero Claudius, son of Tiberius Drusus; and T. Quintius, fon of Titus Crifpinus. Drufus and Crispinus, by Cuspinians Calender and the Siciliun regifters. This Drufus brother of Tilerine Nero was Augusties Calars Wives fon : who being Confel, died in Germany, and both he and his children had the furthame of Germanicus, as Die writeth: which addition the Seriet gave him first of that Province, at Entropius laith. With the death of this Drufus enderh Livies hiffinries: for thus it is written in the last Epitome, &c. Look in the faid Breviary.

doubt not but many of them who shall take delight and pleasure in reading the Roman story abovewritten, will prefently grow into a liking of the very place, whichath afforded fo worthy per four and rare examples. The love whereof bath moved many a man to undertake a wyape to Rome, onlite fee the river Typeris, those seven hils, and the monuments remaining of that famous City. A Summary collected by John Barthelmen Marlianus, a Gentleman of Millain, touching the Topography of Rome in ancient time.

The First Book.

CHAP. I.

The fituation of the City.

Efore we enterprise to shew the edifices and buildings of the City of Rome, somewhat would be premised of the site thereof. Begin therefore we will at the very habitation of the immortall gods; with the invocation of whom, the Roets are wont in every hard and difficult work, to lay their first ground and make their entrance,

The Capitol hill, where it is broaded, exceedeth not 800 foot; in length it lyeth outtoward the Northwest 1500. It hath a point or wing on either side infashion of a semicircle, and in compass containeth well-near feven * furlongs.

. Stadia.

From this mount as it runneth out in length, the Palatine hill is divided by a valley of the same breadth, or somewhat more; making a square with sour angles of unequal sides, containing 1200 paces. For, the one of 600 foot boundeth upon the Capitoline hill; a second of leven hundred foot, bendeth to the Northeast: the third, being almost twice as long, looketh toward the Southeast and the mount Calius: the fourth, which of all others is biggest, and comprehendeth the lifts or shew-place, called Circus Maximus, directly regardeth the Aventine. On the second fide thereof there is one plain, reaching from the head and top of the Forum Rom. to the utmost skirt of the hill Quirinalis, which bendeth toward the Suburra, and taketh up in breadth 500 foor: but it lieth out in length almost a mile from both fronts, between the Capitoll, the Forum Nerva, and the mount Calius: in like manner from the faid mount Calius and Palatine, Suburra and the Elgnilia, as far as to the Church of Saint Marcelline. A fecond plain there is under the other point and top of the Capitol, near the Theatre of Marcellus, which firetcheth our 500 loot from the mount it felf as fat as to the Tyber; and anon over-against the valley from the crooked reach and course of the river; and the nook whereby the Avenine is divided from the Palatine, it spreadeth broader ! but afterwards between the faid hils it groweth narrow, untill ye come to Caliolus and the very gate Capena, where the Aventine is parted from Caliolus only by the breadth of the ftreet or high way. The length of this plain is likewife a mile, having on the right hand, Tyber and the Aventine; on the left, Capitoline mount, the Palatine, and Colins.

Then followeth the mount Calina (separate from the Palatine by a plain) resembling a pyramidal form of a spire, so as the Balethereof containeth 500 foor near to the Amphitheatre. Divided also from the same it is by the freet Appia, fast by the grand Cirque, which reaching to the gate Capena, leaveth on the left hand a valley 600 foot broad, between Calins and Catiolus, lying out in length 4 Stadia, and within a while to the wals which joyn close to the mount Calius, as far as to the gate Asinaria. This hill then from thence lyeth along the City wall for 4 Stadia, toward the Northeast From hence the wals meet afront for the space of two Stadia, even to the gate Navia: from whence as they turn to the Northeast, it is parted from the Efquilia by the fireet Labicana: and anon shewing it selfaffiont nears, Marcellines, it beareth forward as far as to the Amphitheatre. Thus keeping no certain form, it taketh in circuit about 2500 paces. Moreover, the Caliolus is emolofed within the faid valley, the fireet Appia, and all along Northeast and Southeast, with the City wals : and hath in compais well-near a mile.

The Aventine seemeth to contain two hils; the broader part whereof toward the Tyber, and in like manner in length from Tyber along the wals, and anon near the gate Hoftienfis, is divided and cut with a crooked fireet-way which leadeth to the angle of the grand Cirque, and the mount Calius: leaving the other part thereof, divided on the right hand from the mount Calius by the freet Appin, the till you come to the gate Capena, It had in compais 18, Seadia, as Diony fine also teftifieth ; and on the Southeast, a most spacious and large plain of 4 unequall sides: toward the South containing almost 6 Stadia, Westward five, somewhat less Bastward, but toward the Tyber

The Efquilia on the South part is divided with the fireet Labicana; on the Northwest, with the valley lying between Calins, Palations, and it felf; on the North the Suburra; and from the Viminal hill, the fireet called Patritius parteth it, untill, a man come to the bath of Dioclefian. In circuit it containeth about 4 miles, and hath no certain form; infomuch as Varre (not without sood reason)thinketh it two hills, and cutteth it into many parts.

The Vininal hill on the West fide regardeth the Quirinal having about a furlong space the plain Subirralying between on the North it hath the valley Quirindia. Between the same hils there lyeth as it were 4 ingera in breadth, but about a quarter of a mile in length. And anon it joyneth to she Quirinal and Efquilie along the wall of the City, by a continuall row of many arches, whereby these mountains are made even. The compass thereof taketh up two miles and an half; the form thereof is longwise, and the breadth not in every part alike, but variable.

The Quirinal mount on the left hand, directly from the tower called [Militiarum] for the space of 4 Seadia, over-looketh the levell plot of the City which lieth Westward but on the right hand fas clearly appeareth by that which we have faid) it is opposite to the *Imitalia: on the third fide, Morthward; for the space of 6 Stadia, it lieth to the hill called Hortslorum. It hath a valley lying between, in breadth 4 jugera, reaching near to the gate Salaria: and in the whole compais it taketh almost three miles.

Next to it is the little hill Hortulorum, although it standeth without the old pomzey of the city: for the space of 3 Stadia it beareth over the valley Martia lying between it and Tyber. It carrieth in length along the wall of the City, from the gate Flumentana to Collina, a full mile more than any other fides. The circumference thereof is much about 18 Stadia.

There remaineth now the mount Janiculus, on the other fide of Tyber: the one half thereof and not above, is contained within the walls: from the Vatican plain, for the space of 3 Stadia, whereas it firetcheth toward the South, it adjoyneth to the river: the other part thereof is enclosed within the walls, for the compais of five Stadia.

Moreover, above the Vatican plain, there is a little hill of the same nature, which putteth forth two points like horns; the one toward Janiculum, the other Northward, much like a bow full bent: the convexity or outward compais whereof containeth a mile.

Now will we run over the plain and bale plot of the City: which beginning at the Capitol hill near the gate Flaminia, at this day on the Northeast fide (or rather the North) comprehendeth a Diameter or race almost of 8 Stadia, environed with the hils Quirinalis and Hortulorum: but on the West side, the Tyber runneth by it, where along the banks thereof it beareth a greater space. Moreover, by a ffreight and direct line being drawn for two Stadialrom the hill Hortulorum, and namely, where it over-looketh the Piere of Domitian called Naumachia: along the bank of Tyberis, over-against the Pile Hadriani, it maketh a quadrangle of four uneven fides, containing within it more than three miles: without which square is lest the valley Martia, namely as much as lieth between the hill Hortulorum, the wall of the City, and Tyberis: so as the bredth draweth narrowerstill unto the gate Flaminia.

There refteth yet the Transtyberin region, which together with the Janiculum, taketh in compals about three miles. This will be more easily observed and marked by the very channell of Tyberis; which entring into the city, keepeth his course directly on the right hand of the gate Flaminia through the vale Martia, and foon after by little and little turneth from the North Westward, and representeth the form of a semicircle, in the convexity whereof is the Vatican, and within the concavity, the Mars field, Moreover, beneath the Moles or pile Hadriani Jeturning to his former course, as tar as to the utmost foot of the Aventine, winding somewhat crooked into the South, not far from the gate Portuenfis it runneth forth of the city.

Thus much concerning the fituation and form of Rome, and the plot wherein it standeth, which at this day is so far changed, that hardly a man may find any token or memorial of it, as it was in old time.

CHAP. II. Of the founders of the City of Rome, the KK and Inhabitants thereof.

The region (on which Kome was after built) West of Tyber, a hundred and forty surlongs di-stant from the sea, the Sicilians (by constant report) fifst inhabited, Afterwards, the Aborigines leaving Arcadia, by the conduct of Oenotrius the Ion of Lycaon, came into the faid quarters: and being grown into a liking of the place for the fertility thereof, they expelled the Sicilians, and held it for their own ule. In process of time the Pelasgians, a people of Greece, together with the Thessalians, who came to aid the Aborigines against the nations their neighbor borderers, remained also in these parts (with the good will and contentment of the said Aborigines Juntill the Trojan war : but they all retained the name of the Aborigines, which prerogative they held because they were the first, that by arms conquered that seignory and kingdom, Long time after, Saurabeing chased out of Crete by Jupiter his son, fled into Italy: where he taught Janus the King of the Aborigines the skill of planting vineyards, with the use thereof, and likewise the handling of the fickle : in regard of which good turn, he was freely feoffed by Janus in part of his realm, yea, and after the decease of Janus enjoyed the kingdom alone. After this, the Arcadians, who for look the city Palantium (as weary of their own native country) and by the leading of Evander seeking some other place of habitation, arrived at the place where now Rome standeth; received of Faunus the K, of the Aborigines, a portion of ground; built a fort upon a little hill not far from Tyber, and named it Palantium, in remembrance of their native city which they had abandoned. After all this, the Peloponnesians, Phanetians, and Epians, by reason that Elis their native country was wasted before by Hercules, were by him brought a way into Italy, and they planted themselves upon the mount Saturnine. These men lived a long time according to their own laws and customs, untill they being vanquished and subdued by the Aborigines, were incorporated by them into one Commonalty. Then raigned Latinus the ion of Faunus, until fuch time as Eneas the ion of Anchifes, after the overthrow and finall ruin of Ilium, after many adventures and much variety offortine, which he had endured together with the Trojans his companions, came by the infline of the destinies to K. Latinus. Whose daughter Lavinia he took to wise, and so was by Latinus admitred into the fociety and fellowship with him of the kingdom. When the Aborigines and the Trojans were thus linked and joyned together, he called both nations by the name of Latines. Then was Aneas warred upon by Turnus : for that he had married Lavinia, who was espoused and affianced to him before. But Eneas won the victory, and in fingle combat flew Turnus. At that time alfo Latinus died, and left his fon in law Eneas heir to the crown, certain years after was Eneas killed by Mezentius K.of the Tuscans; and Ascanius his son succeeded in the kingdom. He built the towns Lavinium and Alba: and when he departed this life, made over the crown to his brother Sylvius, After him followed Kings, Eneas Sylvius, Latinus Sylvius, Alba, Atys, Capys, Capetus, Tyberinus, Agrippa, Romulus, Aventinus, Procas, and Amulius. This Amulius usurped the kingdom by fraud, which in right of eldership was due to his brother Numitor. And ior sear least there might arise from his brothers off-spring, some one to make claim and recover the royall seat, and thereby himself be thrust out of his place, he consecrated Rhea the daughter of Numitor to Vifta, for to be a professed Nun. She being thus made a votary, and devoted to perpetuall virginity, hapned to be with child by Mars, and was delivered of two boies, twins, namely, Romulus and Remus. Amulius advertised hereof, commanded both the babes to be cast forth to perish, Found they were by Fauftulm a shepheard upon the bank of the river Tyber, and by his wife Fauftula softered and brought up among other shepheards. Remm being grown to mans estate, was taken by certain thieves and robbers, and brought to K. Amuliu. His great-uncle. Accused he was, for that he used to raise booties and drive away whole droves of Number his cattell. Whereupon delivered he was to Numitor for to be punished according to his discretion. But Reman after much discourse of speeches to and sro, was by certain tokens found and known to be Numitor his daughters fon. And at the very time came Romulus also with Faustulus in place, purposing to rescue Remm his brother. Soon they entred into a conspiracy, and at unawares surprized and murdered Amulius: and so restored their grandstre Numitor, In the second year of Numitor his reign, Romalus and Remu built the City of Rome, in the very place where they had been laid forth to perifh, which was the 432 year after the winning of Troy, and the twelfth day before the calends of May. Afterwards in a fray that arose between Romulou and Remus striving for the soveraignty, Remus came by his death, and then Romnius gave name both to the City and Citizens also of Rome,

CHAP. III. The form and bigness of the City of Romnlus.

Omissus fee out the City fourfquar, as Plumeth witneffeth: whereupon of some it is called Quadrata, Others affirm, that the form and compass thereof is uncertain, and by reason of Aueiquity unknown at this day. The hill Palatinus was by Romalm first fortified, because therein he was brought up: at the foot thereof began the Pomarium, Afterwards the Capitol and the Roman

The City began to be marked and bounded out from the beaft-market; from whence in certain places were flories pitched and fet between, along the bottom of the mount Palatine, as far as to the altar of Confus: and to within a while to the old Caria: then, to the Chappell of the Lares and the Roman Forum the bounds were extended, untill a place was affigued for the wals, and a spacious plot to build the City upon.

Titus Tatim began the wall from the rock Cormentalis, and brought it to the way, which is not far from Tyber, From thence; Southward unto the farthest part of the grand Citque; and so Northeast-ward he ranged it into the Farum of Nerva, and in the end joyned it to one of the points of the Capitol hill, and within it compassed both the Capitol it self, and also the Palatine, And finally to enlarge the City, he fet to it the hill Quirinalis and Calins.

CHAP. III be The gates of Romulus bis City.

and Pandana. Others add a fourth thereto, to wit, Janualis.

Carmentalis took the name of Carmentis the mother of Evander, whose Chappel Carmentale flood before the gate. This gate flood under the Capitol on the right hand, between the cliff Tarpeius and the Tyber, over-against the Church now of S Katherine, toward the shew-place Flaminimus. This was afterwards named Scelerata, for that without this gate, in the Temple of Janus, the act of Senat passed, for the sending of the three hundred Fabii to Cremera, who went forth at this gate, and were flain every one at Cremora.

Romana was so called of Romulus: built it was where now the gardens are belonging to the new Church of S. Mary, not far from the angle of the mount Palatine, in the bottom of the cliff of Villaria, Some affirm, that this gate was afterwards called Magonia, of the lowing of kine and oxen: 0-thers name it Trigonia, of three corners that it had.

Pandana was so named, because it stood open for things to be brought through it into the City. The same also was called Libera or Romulida, The place for it they assigned where the gate Saturnia stood, bearing the name of the old City, so called and after destroyed.

Janualis carried the name of the Temple Janus, which is not far off, It flood sometime at the very foot of the hill Piminalis.

CHAP. V. The variety of the compass and walk of the City.

Then the Romans one while made was upon their neighbor nations of Italy, and other-whiles defended themselves against their violence, it happed for the most part that they got the upper hand, and ever as they vanquished any and subdued them under their subjection, in the end made them Citizens of Rome: by which occasion, the City built by Romalus, was not fulficient to receive fo great a multitude. Tullius therefore after his conquest of the Sabins and Albans laid to the City the mountain Colins and the Esquilia, and so enlarged it, Asterwards, when Politorium was won, and a number of the inhabitants translated to Rome; Ancus made a second chlargement of the City, and granted these new commers the mount Aventine to inhabit. The old Romans therefore dwelt in Palatine; the Sabins in Capitalium; the Albans in Calins; and this new come multitude in Aventine. But after the Latines also were received into the City, they joyned Janiculus also to the city by a woodden bridg made over the Tyber; and cast a trench called Foffa Quiritium, about the low and levell places of the city. So the Trans-tyberine quarter was united to the city, and made it more spacious and stately : last of all, Servius Tullius by adjoyning the hils Priminalis and Quirinalis to the five abovenamed, amplified the city. And as before it was mounded about with rubbish, and the same rudely laid, Tarquia the proud was the fiest that enclosed is with a wall of good ashler stone. And the very same wals which stand at this day, were by the posterity this followed, repaired and reedified upon the old foundations. But the city in old time, when as it sourtheed in greatest glory, extended far more in bounds and compass. For in Plinies time the circuir shereof within the wall contained about 20 miles, But in these daies hardly 12. And the whole compais of the city, with the suburbs and buildings about and without the walls (which although they fored far, were comprehended yet under the name of city) in the faid Plinies citie, was 10 miles.

CHAP. VI. The Pomæry of the City.

That void space of ground within and without the walls, which might not lawfully be either ploughed or inhabited, is called Pomory. And sometime it is put for the circuit of the Whole City, This Pomæry was oftentimes fet out farther, and altered by the Roman Emperors, But none had power granted so to do, save only they that either conquered somewhat to the Roman dominion, or endowed the City with some singular and especiall benefit; as the Emperor Clauding and many more. And like as the Romans had no certain limits of their Empire, fo no fet bounds confined either the City or the Pomæry.

Thus much for thegates of the City of Rome, and their names.

The wall in old time had upon it 360 turrets. Some of these are decaied and gone : others repaired, and many this long time are ready to fall.

NOw is it time, and the course of the Story doth require, that leaving the towrs and walls, we enter into the City, and show the beginning and the place of those edifices, which within the walls, either upon the hills or the plain plot of the City, were built by men in old time. First therefore, begin we will at the worthick earthly habitation of all their Gods, to wit, the Capitol.

The second Book.

He Capitol was by the old Romans called Mount Saurraius, either of a City named Saury. nid, which under the very hill was built in that place where now Rome standeth: or because Saurn in times past dwelt in that hill: or else (as somethink) for that the mount it self had Saturn for the tutelar God and Protector therof. But afterwards it was named the mount Tarpeins, of the Virgin Tarpeia, of whom Livy writeth. Last of all, Tarquinus Prisens going in hand to build upon that hill a templeto Jupiter, when he digged for to lay the foundation, chanced to find in the bottom of the trench a mans head; whereupon they called it Capitolaim. And the August being lought unto and demanded, What the finding of that head might fignify? answered, That this Gastle should be the See of the empire and the head of the whole world. This hill they divide into the Castle and the Capitol, The Castle they boilt Northward, as a stronger and more fortified place : but the Capitol, toward Tyberu, a place naturally defended.

CHAP. II.
Who first laid the foundation of the Capital: who finished it: how often it was burnt, and by whom reedified.

IN the Sabine war, Tarquinius Priscus vowed to build the Capitol temple: but after the war was ended, so soon as he had laid the ground-work, he died. After him, Tarquinius Superbus finished the building, of 4 square stone: and descried the charges thereof out of the pillage of Pometia, a Town that he won. When he for his tyranny was banished Rome, Horarins Pulvillus the Conful dedicated the faid Capitol to Jupiter. It flood upright and found for the space of 415 years, until the Marian wars, and then (in the Consulship of Scipio and Narbo) it was consumed with fire. Splace-edified it, and Q. Canlus confectated it : and to it continued until the Vitellian war. During which troubles, it was a fecond time burnt, at what time it flood with the dores faur, undefended, and not rifled. Vespassan built it agains and in his life, a third time it was destroied by fire- and together with the Capitol Velpasian also himself died. Afterwards, Domitan rebuilded it in more magnificent and stately manner than it had been ever before, and disbursed therein a bove: 1 2000 talents. Of the Capitol turrets and pinacles, the statues and images smitten with thunders boks, and blasted oftentimes with lightning, divers writers have made mention.

that of Jupiter Feretrius, vowed by Romulus in the war against the Cenenians, Aster which war ended, and he returned to Rome with victory, he reared a temple in the very pitch and top of the capitol hill. But Jupiter was by Romulus named Feretrius, as some would have it; for that Interpretation in striking the enemy, in that very place where he vowed the temple. Or ele, piter affisted him in striking the enemy, in that very place where he vowed the temple. Or ele, piter affisted him in striking the enemy, in that very place where he vowed the temple. The representation is the property of the Romans, Angus first repaired. This temple first built by Romulus, was afterwards enlarged by Ancus Martius.

But the temple of Inp. Opt. Max, of all other was the greatest and most renowned. This also was called Capitolinum; and Targ. Priscus vowed it. After him, Targ. Superbus expended in the foundation thereof 40000 pound weight of filver, but before that he finished it, he was deptived of his Kingdom for his tyranny, and left the work unperfects to be accomplished by the Romans, Built it was upon the hanging of the Capitoline hill toward Tyberis, as hath been shewed before, For the form, the greatness and beauty of this temple, read Dionysius and fundry other authors, who have written of the Roman acts and of Rome it felf. Upon the top or lantern thereof, flood Summanus the God, made of potters earth, whose head was smitten with lightning and fell into Tyberu. It had within it belides, a fanctuary or fecret chappel, which no Lay person might enter into. Within the faid cell or chappel, were two coronets of gold: the one of them the Gauls consecrated to Inp. Opt. Maximus: the other, the Carthaginians sent to Romein the honor of Inpiter, in token of joy for their victory over the Samnits. Morever, in the faid temple were other three chappels, to wit, one of I. p. Opt. Max. in the mids; a fecond of Minerva on the right hand; and a third of Iuno on the left. And because men in old time attributed unto Minerva the invention of numbers, a law was fet down in writing, That the chief and highest Pretor for the time being, should drive a spike or great nail neer unto her image, whereby the computation of the years might be known. This fo rich and costly edifice, was burnt all at once in the Vitellian war. Now at this day the place wheras it flood, is prophane: howbeit there remain yettobe feen, some tokens thereof, and the soundations; but all deformed and broken peecemeal, Saturn in old time had an altar erected unto him in the very way as ye go out of the Forum up to the capitol, as some think. There be, that would have this temple or altar of Saturn, built by to the capitol, as some think. There be, that would have this temple or altar of Saturn, built by the companions of Hercules: others again (aysthat Taitus reared it. But of this variety in opinion of Writers, this may be the reason, because some affirm, that there were two temples consecrated of Writers, this may be the reason, because some affirm, that there were two temples consecrated fore the capitoline cliff (wherein the bones also of Ovesser brought from Aricia were bestowed the other in that very place, where now standers the chappel of S. The temple of Velovia, stood between the castle and the capitol, in that part where now the chappels are to be seen of conservators. In o'd time they called this Idol-devil, Velovia, because he was deprived of all power to help and do good. To him they sacrificed a she goat: because he

The temple(as also the mint-house) of Iuno Moneta, was built upon that plot of ground, where forming should be house of M. Manlius. This chappel, some report that L. Furins vowed sothers, forming that L. Cicercius the Pretor; and Ovid, that Camillus. Now was Iuno called Moneta, of giving warning; for that from the very place where afterwards the temple was set, there was a voice heard of Iuno, admonishing them of the suture overthrow by the Senones. CHAP. V. The comple of gods which have no certain place now in the Capital.

Mong those gods, whose determinat place assigned to them in the Capitol, is not known where it was, the first was Terminus, as to whom in all the world throughout, there is no proper place appointed. Now this Terminus was a rude and formless stone. Unto him Tains first vowed a temple, and fome fay, that Numa dedicated it. How ever it be; no doubt verily uncient it was, as easily may be collected by that which followeth. But why, that in the Capitol was of men in old time reputed for a god, this was the cause : when Tarquinins Superbus determined to build a temple to Jupiter, he confulted with the Augurs about the place, because he would begin nothing without the approbation of the birds. They thewed anto him the mount Tapeins, but this place was already takenup with other gods, whole chappels there, were confectated and hallowed. These therefore were by certain & crifices to be conjured out from thence, for to give way to Impiter, and to be translated into some other quarter. All the gods willingly yeelded their places up to Jupiter as their K, only Termions refuted to be displaced; and fo remained there till. When he had finished the temple and fore-pare of the roof which regardeth the faid stone, was left naked and open for that god, as who neither ought nor could be enclosed, the augures therfore being fought unto and demanded, For what reason Terminus alone abode still with Jupiter, when all the other gods were gone? made answer, that thereby fignified, that together with religion, their empire alto was eternall. To this god they facrificed not but in open air and publickly abroads as being the god and keeper of bounds. Saint Angustine witnesseth, that Mars also and Juvenius together with Termina; would not agree to give place to Jupiter : for that the dominion of Reme should not be bounded out, nor yet decay with age and continuance of time,

To Mars and Venus Ericina, Assilus and Q. Fab. Max. being Doumvirs, dedicated chappels

upon the Capitol, levered afunder by one vault or ciftern.

To queen Jame, C. Flaminius in the Ligurian war, vowed a temple.

To Ops, Tatius the K. confectated a temple; for that the is called the earth, and is the mother of all things, as bringing forth, all, and receiving all again. Toe same Ops is called Main, Fanna, and Bama Dea. This temple was blatted with fire from heaven, as Livy tellifieth.

Mars revenger, Anguftus Cafar erected a temple upon the Capitol, within the hill Saturnins,

To Faith, on the fame hill, Attelius Collatinus dedicated another.
To Health, Concord, Liberty, and Villory, they built temples: and many there were within the city erected to Concord.

To Fortuna Primigenia and Obsequence, Tullus dedicated a temple.

To Venus-bald they also set up a temple in the Capitol, in memorial and everl fting praise of the Roman dames, for willingly parting with the hair from their heads, toward the making of engins, that during the Gauls war, were devised and made against the enemies.

Tarquinius Superbus built a temple to Jupiter Sponfor, and Sp. Postbumias dedicated it, Likewifeto Jupiter * Pister the old Romans confectated a temple in the Capitol.

CHAP. VI.
Of the flarmes which either in old time were or now remain in the Capitol.

F statues in old time were fundry forts, and the same made of divers matter: some of matble, some of filter, and others of gold. Many of these were set up in the capitol to the immortal gods for divers causes, and namely, for their benefits bestowed upon mankind; which a long time were bonoured and worshipped. To noble men likewise and such as had deserved well of the common-weal, the small maner was in old time to set up statues and images in the temples, to provoke others by their example to do the like.

To Jupiser in the Capitol, Sp. Carvilius erected a flatue in his temple, after he had vanquissible the Samnits, taking the proportion or form thereof by the pattern of Jupiter Latinius his image. Flows maketh mention, that this statue was small much lightning. He also set up another to thundring Jupiter.

CHAP. IX. Of tables, of the brasen columns or pillars, and of the silver Goofe.

N the Capitol there were two forts of tables; the one of Pictures containing the noble acts or battels, with the fiege and affault of Cities, exploited by valiant martial men. For some of them were to defirous of praite and renown, that they could not be content to behold their own ftarues erected in the Capitol, unlesse their acts were described also and depainted in tables fet up in public's place; and by that means left their glory behind them, commended likewife to posterity; Another kind there was of tables, wherein were written in the most ancient laws, to wit, of Romu ut, Nums, and the other KK. Likewise the statues of the later lawgivers : the publick acts and ordinances; the leagues and covenants with other nations; the facted rites and divine fervice, and the ancient records and monuments, which were engraven and cut in braten tables : of which, some at this day re extant; others by continuance of time, by war, fire, and careleffe negligence are I it and perished. For the keeping of these, there were certain persons appointed, that in so serious and important matters, there should be no forgery and corruption.

Pillars likewife of braffe, were by Domittan fer up in the Capitol; the which, Augustasthe conqueror of Agipt, cauled (of many braien beak heads of thips molten together) to be made into four huge columns, and brought them to Rime, Sylla likewise took out of Inpiters temple in Athens, certain bralen pillars, brought them to Rome, & there confectated them to Inquer in the Cabitol.

There was an hallowed place like wife upon the Capitol from whence they gathered Verbena, or facred heros, to make garlands for the facials heralds and the Paterbatrains: wherewith they were crowned when they purposed either to make any accord and peace, or to proclaim war.

The Temple of Concord, and Japiter Stator: mereover what the Curia is

D Etween the Capitol hilland mount Palatine, there lyeth a valley, whereof we have spoken be-Between the Capitol, by order and buildings wherof, as also the places behind the Capitol, by order and courfe we are now to describe. In this valley therefore the temple of Concord deserved to be vifited first : which word, being derived (as it were) from the unity and agreement of heart, maintaineth, augmenteth, and preferveth alone, all things in the world whatfoever.

A temple to this Concord, Camellus vowed, in case he could reconcile the Commons to the No. bles. When as therfore the people were brought into grace and favour again with the Nobility he built the church of Concord, beginning above the Comitium and fo forward unto the Forum. The porches belonging to this temple, are yet to be feen at the foot of the Capitol, From it, there was an alcent of an 100 fteps up to the chappel of Juno Moneta. That temple of Concord, fall in long time to decay, was afterwards by the Senat reedified. Therein many a time the Senat metand fat in counfell, and orations were made unto the people. In this also there was a vault or shrondender the ground, wherein oftentimes theeves, armed men, cutters and backfters were ketterin a prison, untill the assemblies of the people were dismissed. This house had many statues and images curiously and cunningly wrought, namely, of Jano, Apollo, and of Latona, bearing and holding her two babes Apollo and Diana. Likewife of Afculapins and Higgin, the handy work of Nicerains Allo of Japuter Ceres, and Minerva: likewife of the Dames weeping and adoring the faid imsees all made of Stones. Moreover, the images of Mars and Mercarie; the workmanship of Pificrates. Alio of Marfyas-bound, made by Zeuxis the painter, Likewile father Liber and Caffandra, painted by Theodorns. As for the image of Victory in the porch and entrance of the faid temple, it is to be feen how it was fmitten with a thunderbolt.

To Jupiter Stator, Romnius in the Sabine war vowed a temple, that he might stay the flight of the Romans: whereupon be was called, the upholder of the Roman state, Therefore after victory obtained, he built a temple at the foot of the Palatine hill, just over-against the church of Concordia, where at this day be most high battlements of wals. In this house allo, like as in that other of Concord, the Senat affembled oft, Like wife in other temples. The courts, wherein the Senat gathered together in Councel, were temples all, and therein were there acts made . but in the facred churches of the gods, neither met the Senat, nor any orations were made to the people. This temple of Stator was burnt to the ground in that fire of Nerces making, and never after reedified, > CHAP. XII. The temple and grove of Vella : the temple of Faith and of Romulus.

"He temple of Vesta was built by Romulus, between the Capitol and the Palasine hils, notian I from the Forum Romanum; whereat this day is to be een, the church of S. Mary of graces. Neer unto it the palace of Numa was built. The Roman Pontifies, when they would confult of great matters concerning religion, met in the court-yard of Yesta; like as the Senat and people of Rome, debated in councel of their weightielt affairs within the temple of Fath. Now this was a most ancient temple built in Palatium by Romulus, or, as some will have it, by Numa.

There was a grove also confectated to Vefta, which resched from the root of the Palaire, as far as to the large street called Novavia. Out of that grove (before Rome was taken by the Gauls) a voice was heard, giving warning, that the City should be lost, unlesse the wals and gates were re-

The temple of Romulus was feated at the foot of mount Palatine, in the midft of that fide which regardeththe Capitol, in that very place were now the church is of S. Theodore. In this faid templa there is a most ancient monument, the portraiture of the she wolf, yeelding her ceats unto the founders of the City, to be fucked.

CHAP. XIII. Lupercal, and the figeree Ruminalis.

He Lupereal was a cave at the bottom of the Palatine hill, overforead and covered with trees 1 having springs deep beneath under the rock. In the most inward and secret place of this cave

there was an altar confegrated to Pan. But an toughing the ctymology and derivation of the name, as also of the fituation thereof, there go divers opinions; for as in times past the place was close hidden and unfrequented, to now it is inhabited on every fide; infomuch as there remaineth no mark and token at all where Lupercal was. Howbeitthe greater part of writers affirm, that it was in that quarter of the City, where at this day S. Theodors church is feen, For to this place upon a time the Tybre overflowing, made a creeke thither : and hard by it was, where the two infants were cast forth. In the Lupercal therefore, certain authors confidently avouch, that Romulus and Remus were laid to perilh, and fo carried by water to the place called afterwards Ruminalis, were under a fig-tree there, nourished by a she wolf. This wolf haunted & kept in the dea called Lupercal, & from thence ran to the bank fide under the fig-tree Ruminalis for to the fuckle the faid babes, and to gave the name unto the cave to be called Lupercal, as it were the lutking bole and den of the wolf. There be again that would have Evander to give the name to the fame hollow cave : for he, as is before declared, was descended from Arcadia, where the people after most ancient rites and ceremonies, do right devoutly worthip Pan, the god of herdmen. Vnto whom also a mountain in Arcadia to him dedicated, was called Lycans, for that he keepeth, Aures, i Wolves from the Theep, and preserve the flocks and herds. This Evander therefore coming upon a time into Italy, and refling in these parts, consecrated both this grove and cave to Pan, and according to the manner of his countrey, there honoured him. In the faid cave therefore reared was an altar, and a goat thereupon facrificed unto him, as to the god and preferver of the flocks : and leeing that goat thereupon macrimes them, therfore the place wherein he was worthipped took the name*Lu, * Quaf ingit

Now the feast Lupercalia was by Romulus and Romns instituted. For they having obtained of Numiror a plot of ground to build them a City on in that very place where they had beene il forth, called all their companions to a feast and merry meeting : where, after they had killed facrifices, and refreshed themselves with mest, and withall taken their wine liberally to the full, they grew to disport, and in the merry fit clad themselves in the skins of the goars which they had iscrificed, and then fell to hopping and dancing full jocundly. Hereupon their posterity, celebrating the memorialithercof, held a festivall folemonty called Lupercalia, which retained the name of the place where first they began. Hereof lee more in Valerius Maximus, Servius & Plutarch in the life of Astonius, As for the fig-tree Rummalis, it was fo named of the river Tyber, called at the Ramon Some would have it take the name of Romalus. The tokens of this tree remainethunto the time of Augustia Cafar, as Ovid testifieth,

He street called the new way over against the temple of Jupiter Stator, goeth along the valley between the Capitol hill and the Palatine, and reacheth to the Forum Romanum. This, how loever it be called new, was well known to be most ancient, and is different from that, which Caracalla repaired under his baius.

The street Jugarius, otherwise called Thurarius, leadeth from the gate Carmentalis, along the foot of the Capitol hil, to the Forum Romanum. In it was the altar of Jane Juga, who was thought to make marriages, and to couple folk in matrimonies, and the it was that gave the name to Vi-

Vicas Thulsas beginneth at the Forum, and along the foot of the Palatine sheweth the way to Velabram. The reason of the name was this. The Tuscans upon a time fighting against the Aricians, were by them overcome; and after many thoulands of them flain in battel, the reft being few in number fled to Rome ! who taking delight in the pleasant seat of the City, & the commodiousness of the place, determined there to remain. Whereupon having a plot of four fladia granted them by the Senat, between the Capitol and Palatine, they inhabited the same, Herupon the street was called by them Thujens Views, & many a 100 yeer after retained that name. In it afterwards there kept bawds and fuch kind of people, whereupon it grew out of credit, and loft also the first name;

The divers etymologies of Palatine.

Lbeit the hill Palatine were along time inhabited before the City was built, and namely. first by Valentia the daughter of Italns; then by Evander, who also therein fet up a castle whom there succeeded after the City was founded, KK. and Emperors; insomuch as scarcely any one place of Rome is more renowned by writing, then this bil; yet the certein reason of the name why it should be so called, and which a man may be bold to follow, can hardly be fet down. Some would have it so called, because the Arcadians wandring with Evander disor derly, and the Palatines out of the Rheatine territory (called likewise Palatium) came to that mount and it inhabited ! others of Palasthe great grandfather of Evander, Livy thought, that of Palanteum a City of Areadia, it was first called Palantium, and afterward Palatine. There are besides, who of Palatia the wife of Latinus, fetch the original of the denomination : or of Palatho. the daughter of Hyperborens, who bare Latinus unto Hercules, and inhabited this mountains or of Palantia the daughter of Evander, who there was buried : or of Palas, who was himself interred in it. Some there was also, of the blearing of theep, which pastured there in times past, before the hill was by men frequented and peopled, imagine it was to named or elfe becaule flocks were wont there palare, that is, to wander and grafe up and down. And hereupon it is, that Navini called it Balantium, of Balatus ; or Palantium of * palare. Tremellius calleth it the mount Rumuleus, of Romalus his image, found at the very foot of the faid hill. This may fuffice of the derivation of the name.

CHAP. II.

The temple of Victory, Ceres, Juno Sospita, and the mother of the gods : the temple of Liberty and the porch thereof, as also the house of Calsius.

Ow that we have declared the reason of the name of Palatium; we will go forward to shew the temples and houses of the mountain, like as we have done in the description of the Cap.tel hill. When the Romanshad performed fortunatly many martiall exploits, and oftentimes returned with victoric over their enemies, because they would not be found unthankfull to the gods, unto whom they were beholden fortheir happy atchievements, and thereby afterwards mille of the like fortunat fuccesse; they consecrated unto the goddesse Victory a temple in that part of the Palatine, which looketh toward the hortyards and gardens of Maria Nova in the very bottom of the descent, hard at the gate Romans. L. Posthumius an Edile Curule took order for the building thereof, out of certain mony raifed by fines and penalties; and when it is finished, he dedicated it to the goddelfe Victoria.

Neer thereto there was a chappel, confecrated to Vittoria, which M. Porcius Cato vowed.

Besides in the same place was the temple of Juno Sospita. The Arcadians, which with Evander came to the Palatine hill, built a temple also in Palatines to Villory, but as different from this above-named, as far more ancient and to the honor of that goddeffe, jolmn zed yeerly facrifices.

They built a temple alfo to Ceres in the Palatine.

In the fatall book of Sibylla there was a propnesse found, That the forcein enemy and strange boro thould be ennied out of thely, in case the mother of the gods might bebrought to Rome from Peffinas. Now a stone it was, which the inhabitants of that countrey fo called. Sent therefore were Embish into Affa as far as to Peffinus a town at Phrygia: who brought with them that Great mother of the gods in Italy. Then P. Cornelius caried it from the lea into the Palatine, and belto wed it into the temple of Victory, until fuch time as one was built of purpose for her Afterwards. M. Livius and C. Claudius the Centors, took order for a temple to be made to this great mother of the gods, & the fame fet out with statues, pillars and pavement of divers stones of great price. And Junius Bruius dedicated it. The plaies allo and games called Megalefia, wheref Citeto speakerh, were first instituted at the dedication thereof.

Unto Liberty, P. Clodins built a temple and stately gallery, in p. st of Cassins his house, near the temple of Jupiter Stator.

Of the Chappell and altar * Febristthe temple of Lares: the chap pelof the goddeffe Viriplaca, of Paith, and Jupiter Victor.

Not to those gods only that did good to mankind the Romans confectated temples, but dedicated chappels to those allottust did them hart; to the end, that they should do less harm, and punish them more gently. For certein it is, that on the hill Palatine there was a temple & altar both consecrated to the Fever : likewise to Nemefis the goddesse of vengeance ; wheref before in the fecond book.

Befides, they erected a chappel of the Lares in the Palatine.

In like maner, there was a chappel in the Palatine, confecrated to the goddeffe Viriplaca; * Not much into which, if man and wife came together, although they difagreed and were falln out before, unlike, but they returned home again good friends from thence, and all was well.

After that Eneas with his fon Afcanius and daughter Roma came into Italy, they reared a temple to Fairb, in Palatines they which was dedicated not withstanding in the name of the daughter, bre of Pairle. and the fame was written in the forefront of the temple : and therefore many yeers after, when Romalus and Remus strove who should give name to the City, the Senat and people of Rome readding the name of Aineas his daughter in the frontilpice of the faid temple, refolved to name the City after her, Roma.

O. Fabine in the Sabin war, vowed a temple to Jupiter conqueror: and afterwards built it on he Palatine hill. an i there dedicated it.

CHAP. IIII.

The temples of Heliogabalus, Apollo and the Penates: the house of Orcus; theinlace of the Paladium or image of Minerva; and the temple of August us.

Nionius Heliogobalus confectated a god in the mount Palarine, which he called Heliogabas A lus, and built a temple in the place, where before flood that of Orens or Pluto. But to win credit and name to this new and counterfeit god with great reverence and worship; he endeavoured to transfire into this temple of his, * the facred cup of that great mother of the gods, the fire * Sephumion of Vosta, the image of Minerva, called Palladian, the heaver I, icurcheons, and all things elle rather typhum which the Rom, honoured above the rell. The Guillian and J with religion alone there comterfeited, to the end, that no man in the religious worship of that temple and god might aliede any prefence why he should not with good conscience to do.

Moreover, in the Palatine, there was built a most ancient temple of Apollo. This chanced to be overthrown by thunder and lightning; and when the loothlaiers gave on that the god miffed it seredified mother, Augustus Cafar adjoined a porch to the ruins the eot and re dired the term ple a new that there flood : wherein himfelf, when he grew aged, many a time at in councel with the Senat, and empanelled the decuries of judges. Init likewite were pendant canaletticks, branchied with arms like trees, whereon the approved poets belowed their writings. Certain marks and tokens of this temple are to be feen (although obscurely) neer to the vineyard of Fedra, where the house of Tiberins stood. Unto him were instituted the Apollinare games wherefread ficere.

The temple of the City-protectors, called Penates, flood in that part of the Palatine which looketh into the North, even to Velia not far from the Forum. In it were the images of the Trofan golfs. In the fame are portraied two yong men tring together, and holding a ball in their hand. In like maner, the crooked augurs staves called Lumi, of ron and brasse, Besides, an earthen Trojan veffel of potters work. Apollo allo and Neptune were there to be igen.

When the temple of Vefta was on a light burning fire, the image of Pallas being faved out thereof, was transfired into Velia, and gave the name unto temple of Palaca, now S. Andrews church. standing in the same place.

Some report, that there was a temple built in Palatium to Augustus Cafar of famous memory by his daughter Livia.

Augustus fet up a Library of Larine and Greek books in Palatine, and adorned it with the money raised of the most excellent brais of that huge colosius of Tuscan Apollo, He adjoymed thereto a porch or gallery, which they called Palation.

In it was erected by the Senat, a flatue unto Numerianus the Emperor, and a fingular oratory. In the lome porch, the Romans also set up a statue unto M. Varro, whiles he lived.

The A garator um, which was a place where they used to take auguries, was upon mount Palatine. Apollo Palatinas likewife, the workmanship of Scopas, was in Palatium. Latona in the lame was placed.

The the Emperor set up a golden statue in Palatine to Britannieus. M reover the tree which grew out of Rome lus his spear, was in the Palatium. For he, after he had tak in his auguries in the mount Aventine, lanced his spear from him into the Palatine, which to wear their wreathed garlands.

The Polatine bains, whereof Cicero maketh mention in his Oration for Rofeins, were in the fine ? I tum; and of them there remain yet some tokens, above the Circus max, not far from

The most beautifulftreets called A stoniaca, paved with Lacedamonian and Porphyret flones, were in Palatiun, The streets also of Padas, and Fortuna respiciens, were to be seen in Palatine, And there were the games and pattimes celebrated, which they call Palatnal.

CHAP. VII.

The Palatium now called the Greater: the court-yard of the Palatium : and the old gate of the very Palatium it felf.

Tow great a compais the Palatium took up in old time, how gorgeously it was built, how frequent and full of houses, the huge ruins, the pictures, statues, and most pretious pillars there found, do eafily declare. For no man, ever hath left in writing, who fift built to great and stately edifices; who afterwards enlarged the same, and in so compicuous a place erected those houses. By little & little it grew to so great an height, as if all writers should beignorant of those antiquities: neither was any thing at one time dore at once, which seemed worth the memorial. For Historiographers are wont to deliver unto posterity those things only which are rare and worthy of admiration. The mount Palatine at this day is called Palatium majus, and letting and the Church of Saint Andrew, hath scarce two houses inhabited. The rest being either replenished with vines or fit for patture, yeeldeth grafs and food, for theep, caples, and goats. So as it feemeth it may be called Balantiam of the bleating that theep make, rather than Palantium.

This Palatium had also a place therein called Atrium, built in old time and hallowed by August in it the Senat face in councel, because they might not assemble in any place unaugurate or unhal-joyned the Capitol and Palatine together.

There remain yet to be seen certain monuments and marks of the temple of Faustina. Hadrinnus the Emperor her husband founded it at the foot of the Palatine hill (where the brasen image. of a bull standerh) for her sake that she might be honoured as a goddels. No man doubteth but that the temple of Castor and Pollux was somtime in the Roman Forum before the Roftra, neer to that abovefaid of Fauftina. This facred house A. Posthumius the Dictator dedicated : and L. Metellus afterwards repaired and beautified it, with the Dalmatian spoils. In it, as in many other, the Senat used to sit in councel, and therein were publick Orations made to the people. C. Metellus adorned the same with statues, pillars, and excellent painting: wherein also he let up the portaiture and resemblance of Flora, a picture of singular beauty. A table belides, which contains the records and monuments, touching the free burgeoffic granted to the horsemen of Capua. The steps and greeces going up to this temple, Clodius afterwards plucked. up as witnelleth Cicero.

There was a temple or consecrate place called Rostra, at the foot of the hill Palatium, overagainst that before-named of Castor and Pollux, whereas now is the little chappel of S. Mary de Inferno. From these Rostra, were the sentences and acts of the Senat, brought and propounded to

In the yard belonging to Visions temple, Putoins, the fou of a Libertine or entranchifed citizen, In the yard belonging to Visions temple, Putoins, the fou of a Libertine or entranchifed citizen, 303 years after the building of the capitol, vowed the temple of Concord, if he could reconcile the States of Senators and Gentlemen to the people. Arterwards he built it of the americanents and penalties that he took of triurers condemned, at the foot of the mount Palatine, Opinial the Copful afterwards repaired it anew. In it, Pliny testifieth that an altar ran blood for two daies Livia Drufilla in her open gallery, erected a chappel of Concord, in regard of the mutual and lowing agreement between her husband and her: which afterwards Tiberius dedicated

In that place where Drufilla first founded the faid chappel of Concord Veftafian afterwards with wonderful celerity and speed , (after the civil wars ended) finished the Temple of Peace, begun before by Clandian. A large building this was and four square, set our with most starely and fair columns, and of all other Temples the richeft. In it Vejpajian bestowed the holy vessels and pre-tious ornaments of the Temple in Hierifalem, which T had shewed in triumph. It had also the flatue of Ganymedes, and an infinite number of other ornaments wherewith it was decked and beautified. This Temple caught a fire, and at once inddainly was confumed whole; and never was it known to this day how this fire came; unless it were (as some imagine) by reason of an earthquake which hapned the same hour, the stones rubbed together and struck fire,

An alter of Peace was by Angustus first reared; but in what place, the posterity knoweth not The same, Agrippa afterwards enlarged and adorned. Between the Temple of Peace and Faustina, there is at this day a most ancient Temple, and two pillars of the porch to it, which now is dedicated to the two brethren Saint Cofmes and Damians, Some think it was the Temple of Roma-I sand Remns, the same that Carvilius the Consul, after he had subdued the Samnits, dedicated.

That the Temple of Venus Cloacinaftood neer the broad fireet Sacra, Ovid teffifieth. Now the image of this Cloacina was found in a privy or draught, called Maxima, and Tains confectated it. And because it was not known whose resemblance it was, it took the name of the place whereinin was found.

> The Temples of Tellus, Salus, Victoria, the Sun and Moon, the honfe of Cassius, and the Armery.

Here the Temple of Tellus flood, some say it is uncertain; others think it was not far from the Efquilie, neer the rifing of the hill that leadeth to S. Peters Church in Vinculia, whereas now standeth the Temple of Pantaleon, Sempronius vowed it : for whiles he fought a battail with his enemy, at Asculum the head Town of the Picentins, the earth quaked : and because he would pacify the goddess Tellus (i. the earth) which he thought was angry, he vowed this Templeumo her. Built it was in the fame plot of void ground, where the house of Spurius Caffins (who lought to be a King) was overthrown, Neer unto this Temple of Tellus, there was an Armory; where of Cicero allo maketh mention in a certain place. Within the faid compass, C. Junius Bibaculus the Conful, vowed a chappel to the goddess Salas, in the time of the Samnits war. The same was by him put forth to building when he was Cenfor, and dedicated by him Dictator,

L. Volumnius an Adile, caused the Temple of Victoria neer the Roman Forum to bemade, of the penalties and fines taken,

In this place also was the altar of Apollo.

Some would have, that the Temples of Concord and Efculapius, were neer the Amphitheatre, in the place where the gardens be of S. Mary the new.

The Temple of Mercury also was in the Forum.

The Temples likewise of Ifis and Serapis were in the Burfle called Emporium, And somethink, that these were the Chappels of the Sun and Moon, dedicated by Tarius,

CHAP. XIII.

The Forum of Trajanus: the things now theresu, or that have been heretofore.

Hus much of Temples, of holy and religious places, which feemed worth the noting, hath I been briefly written. Now from hence forward we will speak of those things, which shall concern the honour and memorial of mortal men, and first begin we will with that excellent

Prince Trajanus. Forum Trajani was built (with wonderful Art and industry of man) by Apolloderus, between the Forum of Nerva, the Capitol hill, and the mount Quirinal. The same workman built also (at the commandment of Trajanus) Metodeum and Gymnafium. The roof of that Forum or Hall was of brais, within round about in every place the forms and images of horses; and militaryenigns all guile. Now were these foresaid images erected there at the cities charges in memorial of them that had deferved well of the common-weal, or otherwise of some notable act. The triumphant arch in like manner with many other monuments reared to the praise of Trajanus, adorned this Farum or hall of his.

The porch of this Farm, built upon most mighty and high pillars, and resting upon large chapiters, yeelded to great admiration to the beholders, that they feemed rather the works of gyants than men. Into this, Alexander Severus in the honor of Trajanus, translated most beautiful statues

Trajans horse in like manner stood in the mids, bearing upon high columns. In a coin also there is found the image of Trojan, with this inscription: S. P. Q.R. Optime Principi, The Senat and the people of Rome to the best Prince. But hereof Lampridius writeth

Helikewife is reported to have adorned the palace, made of fundry marbles, with pictures and flatnes within.

In the midft of the Forum, there flood the column of Trajan, built with winding flaits. This had round about it the furmary of the acts of Trajan engraven and chafed most cunningly but above all the Dakes was wilding there be 185 steps up to the top; and it hath 40 little windows to let in light into them that shall go up: 120 foot high it was, or (as Eutropius writeth) 140. In the lonver of fancern thereof were the bones of Trajan kept within a golden ball. This pillar Trajan himiell never law for whiles he warred against the Parthians, the Senat dedicated it unto him in his ablence. But he in his return from the Persians, died in the way at Seleucia, a City in Syria, of a flix of blood. His dead corps was brought to Rome: and of all the Emperors, he alone as Europsia writteth) was intered within the City. The reason why his bones are left in that Column is this The manner in old time was, for Princes and Noblemen to be buried under hills: but there being not mountains enough whereupon to raile sepulchres in every place, it hapned that fuch freeples and high pillars were let over their dead bodies inflead thereof.

CHAP. XIV. The Forum, the Palace, and porch of Nerva.

NExt to our fight cometh the Forum of Nerva, and it is behind the Church of S. Hadrian, in the midft of it there flood a Column of brafs of an huge bigness; covered with plate of latters or copper, and hath within it, light every way, This Forum was garnished with divers statues and Columns, containing the whole order of the acts of Nerva, This was afterwards called Forum Tranfitorium for that from it there was the way to the Forum of Augustus, and the Roman.

There appeareth as yet some part of the Porch or gallery belonging to the Forum : for being confirmed by file yet it left certain obscure tokens, witnessing, that in the same place was the Fo-

Part also of the Palace of Nerva, built of 4 square stones and pillars, together with the Church of S. Blafe, are yet feen enclosed between the Comitium and the tower of Militia.

The Roman Forum, the Compitium, the prifon, Tullianum, and the Image of Marforius;

He Roman Forum, which also is called Latinum, began at the foot of the Capitoll, and reached in length to the Church now of S. Mary the new, which is in Velia, But at the first the effectivated bounds thereof were much narrower. For from the head thereof abovenamed, it went no farther than the nearest foot of the mount Palatine. Many a year after, Augustus Cafer enlarged it.

The Comitium joyned to the Forum, or rather it was a part thereof : for it beginneth at the gate .

of Palatium, and endeth at the Church of S. Mary the new.

At the foot of the Capitoll hill, South-east-ward, Ancus Martius built a prison for malefactors to be laid up in After him K. Tulling ad joyned to it that part which is under the ground, and called that dungeon, Tullianum. Made it was of huge and mighty big stones, with narrow long holes, for to receive the shadow, as it were, and resemblance of a light. The dungeon within was vaulted with stone, ugly for darkness, and loathlome by reason of a strong and stinking sent. This whole prior was divided into two parts, the upper room and the nether. Career it was called in Latine corrected, betaute it kept them there enclosed from coming forth.

"Buf before this prifon there lieth a huge marble-idoll which they call Marforius Some think is was the Image of the bakers god, others, of Tupiter, furnamed Panarius, of the tumours that bear out like to loaves of bread. For the Romans in times past, when they were besieged by the Gauls in the Capitoll, had warning by Jupiter in a dream, to make bread of all the corn that they had left, and to throw it into the enemies camp. Whereby the Gauls despairing that the Romans could possibly becamed with hunger, brake up the siege. Whereupon the Romans in perpetual memoriall of this benefit, erected an altar and a statue to Jupiter Piftor.

This image is thought to be the resemblance of the river Rhenus in Germany, because it is upon a rock. But why it should be called Marforium, I know not unless it be because it standeth in the Forum of Augustus.

CHAP. XVI. The Secretary of the people of Rome ; the arch of Septimius ; the Temple of Saturn Of the Treasury, and the mint-house where they coined mony, Behind the image of Marforius, overagainst the arch of Septimius is the Church of S. Martina:

Secretary of the people of Rome.

Right against the faid Church of S. Martina at the bottom of the rock Tarpeia; flandeth the arch of Septimine, which in both the fronts thereof containeth the deeds of that Emperor both by land and fea.

Directly there followeth the Temple, sometimes of Saturn, now, S. Hadrians Church. The said Temple was of great antiquity. Some report L. Largins for the builder thereof; others L. Tarquinius : albeit more likely it is that Largius dedicated it Livy writeth, that when A. Sempronius and M, Minutins were Coff, Numantius Planem reedified it. The treasury of the people of Rome, no writer denieth, but that it was translated out of the Capitol into this Temple. But why men in old time would have the treasure to be within Saturns Temple, thete be divers opinions. Some lay becaple in Saturns daies there was no theft committed: for under him all things were common; no covetous miser nor lewd person laid wait for his neighbour, but all things were administred with righteonfnessfaith, and love. Cyprian alledgeth this cause, because Saturn was the first that in Italy ordained money to be coined. Moreover, in this treasure-house were kept the publike ordinatices. Also the books called Elephantini, containing the five and thirty tribes of the people of Rome, Moreover, all the books of the Cities accounts: also the ancient writings and records of the old Erarium and the City debts. Furthermore, the flandards and enfigns of war. Over and befide, what foever was by the Generals and Captains after the conquest of Provinces carried in triumph, was thither brought. Laftly, what foever was expedient and profitable for the Common-weal to be referved, as laws, letters, and other common registers of a City. The Centers likewife were put to take their oath in the Temple of Saturn.

Between the Church now of S. Hadrian, and that which sometime was the Temple of Costor

CHAP. VII.
The golden Miliarium the bridge of Caligula, the Roftra and the Curie. Hiarium aureum Rood in times past at the head of the Roman Forum, under the Temple of MS. sturn, near to the arch of Septimius. A pillar it was, so called, wherein all the high waies of Italy were cut and engraven, and there ended, and from which the measures began and weston to every gate of all quarters.

Caligula brought a bridg of marble through the Roman Forum, from the mount Palatine to the Capitoll, A more flately and curious piece of work there never was throughout all the City for the bridg was fulfained with fourfcore mighty pillars of most white marble: whereof at this day three are to be seen at the foot of the one hill, and as many at the other, in such manner as they were in times past by Caligula built for the bridg. In the midst of the Forum, over-against S, Had-ians Church there standeth a pillar, which is verily thought to be one of them that supported the brazen horse of Domitian gilded all over. At the foot of this horse was the resemblance of Rhene, a tiver in Germany; for that Domitian the Emperor had triumphed over that Province, And this is the Image which afterwards they called Marforius.

Of the beakheads of the Antiat ships, a pulpit was built in the Roman Forum by the Romans at the foot of the mount Palatine, which Temple they called Roftra, that therein the acts of the Senat should be made. Now of this Rostrathere were twain, the new at the bottom of the Palatine. as is beforelaid, and the old, ner the Curia in the Comitium. In this Rostra were laws published, causes pleaded, and Orations made to the people. On the same the manner was also to creen the

et in a real control of Physics

In the most conspicuous place of the Forum Romanum, before Roffra, upon a lion of stonewas the portraiture let for Faustulus the fosterfather of Romnius and Remus. For he, whiles he was defirous to part the fray between Romulus & Remus the founders of the City, was there flain, where, afterwards they erected unto him his statue. Behind the Rostrawas the lepulchre also of Romulus, Moreover, before the Roftra flood the flatue of Hercules, clad in a coat after the Eleans habit, with a grim and flern countenance. Three flatues also of Sibylla in the same place. The manner of the Romans besides, was to let up the heads of those that were putto death, there to be seen,

Two Curic or Councill-houses at Rome there were: one near the Forum, fast by the Temple of Peace named Hostilia; the other in the mount Calius, whereof we will speak hereafter,

CHAP. XVIII.

The Lake Curtius, the great fink or town ditch, and the Doliola.

He lake Curtius was in the midst of the Rom. Forum, near Domitian his horse, This lake took that name of M. Curtius, who to lave the Common-weal, willingly of his own according himself headlong, armed as he was, together with his horse into a chink of the ground in the midst of the Roman Forum, Some would have it so called of Metius a Sabine, who through this lake escaped safe to his own company. The vault or fink called Cloaca Maxima, was made by the commandment of Tarquin: for by reason that the hils were digged under, and the (ity flood hollow upon arches, it received & carried away all the filth thereof. At the Temple of Jup. Stator, divided it was into three conveyances or channels, whereof two of them are now stopped up, the third runneth with most clear water by the Lake Curtius, under the Roman Forum, along the foot of the mount Palatine into Velabrum, and from thence in a fink made offour-square flone, it dischargeth it selfinto Tyber. In old time there were many such vaults, and those for publike use. But after the City was won by the Gauls as burne, whiles every man made hafte to rebuild his house, where he could meet first with a convenient place; they took no heed to the fireers as they were before : fo as neither the City was divided as aforetime into quarters, nor yet the finks which in times pall went under the fireets, were marked where they lay: but afterwards were conveyed under privat mens houses, whereby it came to pals, that each house almost at this day hath a fink or privy belonging to it. Hereupon also it is, that this author, whose epitome or abridgment we write, hath not divided the regions of the City,agreeable to the old writers. But to the end that those things which he setteth down might be sooner understood, and better remembred, he hath parted it into those quatters as now it standerh and when he sheweth in what part of the city any place in times past was, he declareth them in those coasts which at this day are known to the Inhabitants. But as at first these sinks were coasts mon (as I have faid to there were appointed publike overleers to look unto them.

Near the forefaid great fink there was a place, which of certain barrels under the ground was called Doliola. This place was reputed to holy, that a man might not fpit thereupon. In it were tupposed to have been certain secret mysteries of Numa, And yet, there be that think verily the ashes of the French Senones were there bestowed.

CHAP. XIX.

The Comitium, the Temple of Venus Genittix. The Statues and Images that were in the Comitium and Roman Forum. Calars flatue and pillar.

7 Here the Comitium was, from what place it began, and in what part of the City it ended. we have shewed before, in the fifteenth chapter of this book. Called it was Comitium, as Plutarch faith, for that Romulus and Tatim were wont to meet together in this place to make covenants between them. In which place afterwards, the Senat and people of Rome aftembled, when they would decree any thing for the good of the C.W. and namely, when Confuls, Tribunes Confular, and such Magistrats were created, and other affairs concluded, whereof authors make mention in all their writings. That place was near the Senaculum, at the very foot of the mount Palatine. This Comitium was open above-head for many years: whereupon of entimes, albeit affemblies were immoned, yet they were empeached holding for them, fearing some tempessuous weather toward. Long time after, when Annibal came into Italy, they let a roof over it: and afterwards Cefar repaired it again. In this Commium the places were many times exhibited. In the fame (as Livy reporteth) the books of Sibylla were burnt. In like manner many lewel and outragious acts were committed in the affemblies there, whereof elsewhere we will speak.

In the Comissium Rood the Ratue of cocles; which being afterwards fitucken with fire from heaven, was translated into the court-yard of Vulcan, In the cantons and angles of the Comitium, were the statues likewise of Pythagoras and Alcibiades: Also in the ascent and stairs thereof, on the left hand of the Curia flood the Image of Accius, together with his whetftone and razor.

The image relembling the Mother goddels, was fet up in the Forum. They that worshipped this goddess were of this opinion, that the flone whereof the was made, could not possibly be confumed with fire: which they guessed hereby for that albeit many fires were made in the night especially at her Image, yet it took no hurt thereby; and therefore gave they out, that there was such vertue herein, as I have faid. And from thence it came, that in all streets almost they began to worthipher and to erect altars and little chappels unto her.

The Temple of Venus Genitrix, as is shewed before, was in the Forum: Just before this Temple stood the statue of cafar, carrying a blazing star upon the he d. In like maner a Column of cafar made of Numidian marble 20 foot high there remained. Before the Temple of caffor there was the statue of Q. Martin in hotsemans habit : of Tremellim clad in a side gown ; of M. Atti-

CHAP. XX.

The column called Mounia : the pillar Horatia: the houses of Casar, Constantine, and Domitian, The Temple and Cours-yard of the faid Calar.

N that part of the Forum was the Column Mania, where stood the palace of Portius, Called Mania it was, of Mania the Cenfor: for he (when as he fold unto cashis house, and when Flacem the other Cenfor gave order, that the palace aforesaid should there be built, reserved in the fale fo much space for himself, as pillar or column would take up: upon the which he might put out aloft to juttorth, made of joifts and boards upon them: from which place both he and his posterity might behold the sport of sword-sencers. And this priviledge he obtained: whereupon, others allo, as many as might be allowed, were as industrious, and built them columns in the Forum.

There flood a rock of flone in the Forum, whereupon the spoils of the three twins Curiatii were hanged.

In like manner the pillar callas Horaria.

The houses of Casar, Conftantine, and Domitian beautified the Forum. Likewife the court and cloifter of Mineroa; and the shops [of Bankers] as well old as new.

The Topogruphy of Rome.

The dead corps of Cafar was brought out of the Curia into the Forum, and interred in that place: where afterwards they built unto him an altar and Temple.

Likewise in the Forum the manner of the Romans was, to lay down their Magistracy.

CHAP. XXI. Calars Forum : the Palace of Paulus, and his Library.

Besides the Temple of Saturn, or the common treasury (whereof we have written before in the 16 chap of this book) in the Roman Forum toward the Northeast was Cafar's Forum, even in that very place which feemeth lower than the rest behind the Temple of Faustina. There was the Temple of Venus Genitrix, about which Cafar made a cloifter and a Forting; not of water and merchandile to be fold, but for them that repaired thither for justice in law matters, In this Forum, among other statues (whereo) there were many and those most fair and beautiful) he suffered his own to be made, all armed. The Forum it self contained but a small compass, but it was most excellently fer out. The very level of the plot flood him in an hundred millions of Affes and above.

Cafor purchased with 1500 talents, Paulm Emplins the Collegue of Marcellus in his Conful-Thip, to be his triend and to thand with him, Paulus having received this fum of money, built in the midft of the Forum near to the Temple of Caftor and Pollux, a most excellent and wonderfull Palace, of Phrygian columns which afterwards they named, Bafilici Pauli,

A Library also thesame Paulus erected, near unto his own Bafilies.

CHAP. XXII.

The Forum of Augustus : the galleries of Autonius, Faustina, and Livia : Calars house.

THe Roman Forum, those also of [Julius] Cafar and Augustus, were (as it is well known) near The Roman Forum, the of Augustus, they affirm to have been at the image of Marforius, in the most frequented place of the City: it was but in little compass, as the other of Cafars, but excellently wel adorned with brave statues and other things. For it had the statues of Caffor and Points, with the victory of Alexander the Great: the image also of Corvinus, and of the raven that upon his helmet fought. Also Apollo in Ivory; and besides these, other ensigns and ornaments of venue

In this Hall or Forum, publike justice was administred : and the judges from thence were empanelled: herein they debated in councill, of wars; of triumphs, and other weighty affairs. From hence they used to go when they took journey into their Provinces with soveraign command. Hither, they that returned victors, brought the enligns and tokens of their victory. This Forum

This Forum had two porches, wherein were the statues set out & decked in triumphant manner. Augustus dwelt in the ftreet Sacra, in a house not so large and starely, but marvellously simished by his neece Livia, And Augustus not able to abide this wastful superfluity of riches, pulled it down and laid it even with the ground: in the void plot and court-yard whereof, was afterwards built the gallery of Livia; which also was called Claudia. Nero cast it down, but Demitian built it up again under the old name.

The goodly galleries of Antonine & Faustina, adorned with divers and fundry marbles welbuilt

CHAP. XXIII.

The rafter or beam, called Sororium Tigillum : the fireet Cyprius, Sceleratus; and Patritius; the house of M. Antonius.

Sororium Tigillum was a place hallowed for the expiation and affoiling of Horatius forkilling his fifter, ietup near the lireet Carina, to the honour of Jupiter.

The freet Coprim is near to the cliff or rifing of the Capitoll, which leadeth to the Church of S. Peter in Vinculis, so called of Cyprus, In it dwelt the Sabins first, when they were attachized and made free denizons, Surnamed afterwards it was Seeleratus, upon the wicked and devillish act of Tullia, whereof Livy speaketh, Some think this was one with the former: others 124, it was divers

The fireet Patritius was so called, because of Patritis, who were by K. Tullus commanded there to dwel. For this was a place raifed somewhat higher than others; from whence as from the upper ground, they might eafily defend themselves against the sudden violence of others, it it should

M. Metonius dwelt in that house, where sometimes stood the Temple of Tellus, After Antonius the Church of S. Pantalion was in the same place built,

Busta Gallica, and Æquimelium. Rufa Gallica, was a place in the heart of the City, where the dead bodies of the Frenchmenthat held Rome, were burnt and buried. It was in that part of the City where at this day flandeth the Church of S. Andrew (in Buffa Gallica) Now they call it by an awk name, Poringallo : and it is nor far from the Amphitheatre Varre letteth the Buffa Gallica near the Aquimelium, As for Aquimelium, it was so called, because the house of Meliu, who sought to be K. was there laid level with the ground. 1114 110:

His firest beginneth at the old Caria, in the angle of Palatium near the arch of [Great] Con-Anthree Marro Inpposent that it began at the Carina and the chappel of Sternia, Whereby a man may gather that the Via facra fometimes wens through the gardens now of S. Mary the new, to the Temple of Peace, the Forum of Cafar, and to directly up to the Catile of the Capitol. The same of Same strook for that the Augus when they came from the Capitol hill, went through it as they took their Augury or because monthly, they went in procession with facred reliques along that way for last of all in regard thatin it there was a league and covenant made between Romulargand Tatime. At the head and top of it, Anous Martins in times past dwelt, near the chappel of

In this fixeet was the famous flatue let up of Clal a.

The arch Fubian likewife, pear the Kings Palace, fast by the Basilien of Paulus, was reared by Fabine the Centor, who subdued the Allobroges. In which arch was the scutcheon with his arms, and other tekens of the victory engraven. Fall by it, Scribonius Libo erected a feat and Tribunal for the Prztor named Puteal.

In the samestreet-way was the marble arch of Vefpasian, (the ancientest of all others that are now to be feen) exected by Vefpafian after he had won Hierafalem. In it were his victories cut and engraven, with the ark of the covenant of one fide, and on the the other, his triumphs and spoils; and namely, the golden candlestick; the seven other lights the two tables of Moses, the veffels of the Temple of Hierufalem; the golden table, weighing one great talent; and many things elle, whereof Josephus writeth.

CHAP. XXVI.

Gracoftafis ; Senaculum ; the Curia ; the Palaces of Opimius and Porcius.

Recoffasis a place on the right hand of the Rostra, as mengo forth of the Comitium; where, Tthe Embafadors of forcain nations being fent unto the Senat, used to stand and give attendance untill they were admitted to audience

The Palace of Opimim, and the Curia food near anto the Gracoffasis. Above the Gracoffasis was the Senaculum at the Temple of Concord Called it was Senaculum, because the Senat or the elders were wont there to meet, In Greek it is named Teguria.

Caria was in the Comittum, and some think it is all one with Senaculum; so called, because the affairs that required publike care were there debated. There was a Curia also of Priests, where Church-matters were handled and treated of Now this Curia where the Senat met, was a Temple or hallowed place: for neither might the Senat meet, nor act of Senat pass, but in the place fer our and appointed by augury. Hereupon Curia Hostilia, Pompeia, and Julia, being profune places before, were by inauguration confecrated Temples In this Caria was the alter of Victory: and upon the stairs of the said Curia stood the image of Victory, made of fine pure gold.

Cate the elder in the time of his Centorship, built (with the City money) a palace near to the

The palace also of Romulus (as men think) stood where the Church is now of S. M.:ry the new. These places therefore which have been thus described in the fourth region of the City, joyned engether in one place in a manner, and were all contained within this circuit, as you go from the Camitium toward the Temple of Peace, and the Church and gardens of S. Mary the new almost as far as the Efquilia.

The fourth Book.

The Temple of Janus and Picty : of the publike goal of Rom, Commons,

Eeing that four parts of the City are described, the fifth ensueth; which include th those places that comprehend Tybre, part of the Aventine on the right hand, and the rock Tarpeia on the left: the valley also which lyeth between those very hills. Wherefore begin we will at the memorable places, which are next after the Theatre of Marcelles, and fo run through the plain and levell plot of the City. And with Janus first, whom men in old time believed to be the very door, and as it were the entrance of all things. Unto Janus Numa built a Temple at the gate Carmentalis, (afterwards the chappell of S. Katharine) at the bottom of the Argiletus, close unto the theatre of Marsellan. This Temple had two doors: in time of peace they were shure but in wat opened by that Conful, who, as the worthier person, was first created, it is found in tecords, that this Temple was thut but only thrice, First, by Numa himself: secondly, by T. Maning the Col, and a third time by Augustus, after the battel of Allium, But why in time of war it flood open many reasons are giver : and this is thought the chiefest, namely, an accident that beself when Rom lu Warred against the Sabins : for when the Sabins were now possessed of the gate Carment. ilis, and about to rush violently into the City, all on a sudden unlooked for there issued forth upon the enemies a plenteous river and fream of hot scalding water out of the Temple of Janus, which flood near to the gate: whereupon they were driven to flee, and fo the City was faved From hence it is that politerity coming after, open the doors for Januar that he might be at liberty, when he is called forth, as it were to help in time of war, Others report, that Tarim and Romains both were the founders of that Temple: as who, when the covenant was made betwint them, agreed together of that two-faced god: as an indifferent and common witness to them both of the accord contracted between two Kings and two nations; and to erected unto him this Temple in that very place where now the ruins of S. Katharines

Church are to be feen.

Moreover there be who affirm, that Cn. Duilim vowed it, and Tiberim built it: butthe variet of thele opinions feemeth hereupon to arife; for that it is received and held for certain, that there were many Jani worthipped as gods by the posterity; whereas they in old time believed but one: fo as that which is spoken of divers, is fallly supposed, as faid of one. Which may be seen before, whereas we wrote of Janus with four fronts or faces, whose Temple was erected in the Forum. For it is faid, that James was the first who erected Temples and ordained divine fervice and ceremonies for the gods; and therefore in facrifices deferved the first place,

Pourtraied he is with a key and a wand; as who is the porter to keep the gates, and the guide to direct the waies.

Augustus befides, brought his image out of Egypt to Rome, and in the herb-market built a Temple in the honour of him.

To Piety in the faid herb-market, M. Atilius Glabrio dedicated a Temple in that very place where at this day standeth the Church of S. Nicholas in the prilon: for even there Ap, Claudius the Decemvir by a decree of the Senat built a prison, for that the commongoal (whereof we have written before) was not fuffi ient; and called it. The prilon for the Commons of Rome: wherein himself afterwards being found guilty wrought his own death. In which also many years after, a certain filly poor woman of bate and obscure parentage being newly brought a bed being apprehended for an heinous offence, was condemned to bestarved to death. Her daughter, being a milch woman, and delivered lately of a child, made humble request to the goaler, that the might have leave to go to her mother: and when he had made fireight fearch before, whether the brought with her any food; and saw her have nothing about her, let her in: and so she went and came many times. At the last, known it was that the prisoner within was nourished by the breatmilk of her daughter: whereupon the mother was delivered and fet free; and both mother and daughter were allowed their food ever after by vertue of a decree, at the Cities charges, and in regard of that kindnels and affection of the child to the mothersthey confecrated this place to the goddels Pietas. Livy supposeth, that it was not the mother but the father that in this manner was by the daughter nourished,

Within the compass or the faid market-place, C. Cornelisa the Conful, in the time of the Gauls war, vowed a Temple to Juno Materia: which afterward being Cenfor, he put out to building, in that very place where afterwards frood the Church of S. Andrew, furnamed in Memuza.

The fame C. Cornelius built in the Forum Holitorium the Temple of Hope, and the fame adorned with divers and fundry marbles: which afterwards Collatinus confectated, Many a day after, it was fmitten with lightning; and in the end fet on fire and burnt

The beaft-market was near to Velabrum and Janus, between the mount Palatine and the Greek school, close to the Temple, now called S. Gregories Church. In it there was a most ancient image in brass of a bull, whereupon some think it took the name Boarium. Others, for that oxen were there fold: or because they used in old time to sacrifice those kind of beasts there: or else, for that Evander in that place killed an oxe in facrifice to Hercules, for killing Caeus and recovering again his kine and oxen. In the same place were kept the instruments wherewith the Ministers belonging to facrifices, the facrificers also themselves, were furnished when they went about their facrifice. In this market-place was the first fight exhibited of sword-fencers.

> CHAP. VI. The Temple of Hercules Victor, and the Altar called Maxima.

He round Temple of Jupiter Vitter was built in the beast-market, near the Greek school where sometime Evander reared unto Hercules the altar called Maxima. This Temple (as they say) was so religious and venerable, that neither slie nor dog would enter into it. For Herenles at what time as he distributed a dole of flesh to his followers and ministers in his sacrifice, praied unto Myiagirus [the god that gathereth flies.] He it is therefore that driveth away all flies from this Temple : and at the door thereof he left his club behind, which as food as the dogs fee they run away far off: and thus unto the daies wherein Pliny lived it was free from flies and dogs. At the facrifice and divine service of this Hercules, neither women nor bondslaves, nor yet freed men that had been in villenage might be present. At the last, this Temple was consumed in that fire which Nerothe Emperour made.

Over and befides, Evander erected unto Herenles a statue, which was called, Herenles Triumphant because so often as there was any triumph in the City it was clad with a mantle, and other habiliments of triumph.

All the time that Evander raigned Hercules had no more but an altar which they called Maximia and this Evander reared unto him for killing of Cacus, and restoring his kine and oxen again. 129 34: 15%

Some there be that would have Vertumnus and Janus with sour faces to be all ones upon this reason, for that they affirm the Temple of Janus aforesaid to be in Velabrum, whereas they built that of Vertumnus; But now that Temple whereof we have before spoken, upon four pillars beareth up one roof, and hath four gates befides, and in each forefront twelve little windows, which signifie the four quatters of the year, and the twelve months. In old time they put Janus before, in all factifices, and gave him that name ab sunday is going and hereupon the entries and doors of houses becalled Janus.

Moreover, some there be that in this place would have the Affinin to stand-but we have shewed before that Affinin was first built by Rom, upon the Capitol. But in process of time, after that so great riches and wealth was gathered and laid-up there in the Capitoll, and that other whiles the Senat used there to meet and se in councils the Rom, thought it not with the lassest for them that thieves, sellons, and other lewed in samous perions of all forts, should come for refuge thither, and there abide. and therefore they supposed the terror their security to translate this priviledged another to so some other place. Whereupon not there alone, but in many other parts afterwards there began sanctuaties to be set up, not at Rome only, but also in other quarters of the world.

CHAP. X: Circus what it is why it was so called, and for what cause or dained

He place where games & exercises of disport were performed, was called the Cirque so natured, for that the scatfolds were build in circuit round about to behold the pattines; and within that compais the said solemnities were exhibited: also for that the pomp was carried in shew, and the hories can about the goals there. Built it was round, but longwile like an arch of bow, having in the circuit about it steps one above another, with apticats for the beholders, that one should not hinder the prospect of anothers in the middle were two marks or goals distain alike one from the other. Also the barriers or carere is so called because the hories stood there pent and kept in until the Magistrate gave the signal so begin the course.

Now these solemnities of games and plaies are restivals in the honour of their gods: for ordained they were first, and still are observed and kept, either for their birth-daies & nativities, or dedicarious of Temples. And arthe very first verily were hunting and baiting of beatls, which they called (Manera) to the honour of Saturn, But the stage-plaies were due to Liber: the Circensian games to Neptune and Gerst, Thus these pathines were assigned, some to these gods, and others to those; and in honour and memoriall of them yearly solemnized. As for the games Circenset, were so called, because when they were to be performed, they had the bank of the river of one side, and swords set to stank the other. But of these games, plaies, and sloemn sights, Sissium hath written at large.

CHAP. XI.
The great show-place called Circus Maximus.

Arguinus Priseus instituted first this large circuit for running of races, and laid the foundation thereof between the two mounts Aventine and Palatine, But Cafar was he that enlarged it, and made it more magnificent and stately. For being (as it was) three surlongs and an half in length, and four acres broad; it is thought that it was Casar and not Tarquin, who set it out to that largeness: and this foundeth like to a truth, confidering that in Tarquins daies the City was not so populous, neither given so much to these shews and fights, as in the time of Cafar, and therefore the place required not so great a compals of ground. Now this Cirque for three parts thereof to wit, the two fides and one of the ends, had a ditch digged ten foot deep, and as many broad: behind that ditch were galleries built three flories high; and there had leats made beneath with stone, and above of timber: all which galeries had one and the same bases for they closed together round like a globe. Ablethey were to receive a hundred and fifty thousand men. Seemore hereof in Diony fins, Pliny, Livy, and others who have written of the Roman Edifices. 15 This Cirque Augustus adorned and beautified afterwards: for he made the barriers of marble, and guilded the goals, and many other ornaments he let it out withall. Laftly, when it was de-1: caied and faln down, Trajan reedified it, made it more ample, and trimmed it up. Yea, and after him, Heliogabalus fet thereto besides most fair and goodly Columns, and garnished them with gold, and paved the very floor with Chrysocolla. But as touching the beauty of this Cirque, Nazarini writeth much. For, by report, so elegant it was, that men resorted to it, not fo much to behold the exercises and masteries there, as the pleasant and delectable beauty of the place. Maximus therefore it was called, either because consecrated it was to Vortumnius, the greatest of the gods, or for the excellency and sumptuoniness of the games : or else because in comparison of other Cirques, to wit, Flaminius, and the other called Intimus, i.e. the inmost, this was the biggest. For Pliny hath left in writing, that it lay out in length three furlongs, and one in breadth, fo as it would well ferve for two hundred and fixty thousand men to fit within it.

CHAP. XII.
The Temples and Altars which we read to have been in the Circus Maximus, or about it.

Onfus is reported to be the god of Counfell, either for that he concealeth mens counfels, or openeth them unto men. This God had an altar in the great thew-place covered over which betokeneth, that counsell ought to be close and covert. For which cause, this altar as we read, was by the old Romans to him confecrated. For they at what time as they consulted about the ravithing of the Sabine maidens, fearing left they should have been detected before the time dedicated this altarto this god, and erected the portraiture and image of him thereon. Which altar verily either by some injury of the times, or through mens neg ect of the gods, continued so forlet, as it theend it was altogether unknown where it flood. At length found it was again, and at all o. ther times remained covered, but in the time of horse-runnings, and then it was uncovered and set open. To this god was the scale also instituted, called Consulia. And those disports and pastimes which they devised for the ravishment of the Sabin Virgins, were celebrated at this altar by certain Priests belonging to that god.

In like manner Neprune formamed the Chevalier had a Temple in this Circus Max, which in the year of our Lord 1526 was found behind the Temple of S. An stafia at the foot of the mount Palatine, in the very foundations of the Circus: for fuch marks and tokens were there to be feen, that by good evidences it appeared that this was the very Temple of Neptune. For the honour of this Neptunesthe games Circenfes were by men in old time folemnized.

Alle to Genius the guide and director of fecret plots, they directed an alter in the great Cirque, Over and besides these, this Ci que contained three other alears: one to the Great gods; a second to the Penats; and a third to those gods of heaven and earth from whom all things artic and have their beginning. Thelegods abovelaid, the Romans called Genis, Penates, Prefidents, and keepers of the City.

Liber, Libera, Ceres, and Proferpina, had their Temples about this place called Circus Max. which Postbumius when he warred against the Latines, vowed and the same man upon his return with happy victory built and dedicated them accordingly.

To conclude, in the same compass were the Temples of the sun, and of Flora.

Moreover, a Temple there flood near this Circus, unto Venus: which Q. Fabius Gurges the Col. caused to bemade of the money raised upon the fines of certain wives that were condemned for playing falle with their husbands.

Lucinus dedicated a Temple to Juventus without the great cirque, not far from that place,

In like fort, Mercury had a Temple near this Circus Max.

In Plinies daies there was feen in the Cirque Max, the image of Fortuna Seia, CHAP. XIII. The Naumachy of the great Cir que.

Namachy is a place so called 571 duribs rais, rais 1 pay to 1770, 1.e. for that in it they used to skirmish with ships. For there were places digged deep like ponds, where were represented some thews of navall fight for the exercise of the Roman youth, that they might know how to charge and annoy the enemy at fea alfo. And these kind of sports were exhibited and practised not in the cirques only, but also in the Amphitheatres.

CHAP. XIV. The two Obelisks of the Cirque Max.

T'He Obelisk (as Marcellinus testifieth) was a very huge and rough stone rising like a spire or L broch, by little and little to a mighty height: and that it might resemble a ray or sun-beam, it groweth smaller and smaller in fashion of a teeple, with four sides or edges, and in the top it is very narrow, and there made plain and smooth right artificially. In most of them are engraven and cut certain Hieroglyphick notes, and namely, such as testifie either the sounder thereof, or else other memorablematters. Of these figures and characters, the same Marcellinus speaketh in this wife:Moreover the infinite variety of forms and characters, called Hieroglyphicks which all about we see engraven, the ancient authority of the first learning did set forth and mark so. Thus much faith he Now they drew and portraied therein fundry forms and shapes of living beasts and birds, and oftentimes devised new and ftrange resemblances, whereby they reserved and kept for their posterity whatsoever was memorable and worth remembrance. This manner continued not in Egy pr only, but also in other parts of the world, untill such time as letters were found : and then this was given over. At the first one letter implied a whole word and one word went for a whole fent ence, But hereof ye shal find much in authors that have written of these characters. Moreover, as Pliny witnesseth, these Obelisks were made of the stone Simples. Them they erected and confectated consecrated to the gods, and principally to the Sun: and therefore in hewing and cutting them. they resembled the sun-beams, as we faid before. The first that ever devised these Obelisks, was K. Methres. At Rome were none of these Obelisks wrought and cut out, but brought thither from other parts, and fo for beautifull shew and to wonder at were erected. Therefore in the Cirque aforelaid, called Maximus, two Obelisks were seen, one standing upright alost, 80 foot high: the otherlying along inthe Naumachi; it carried in length a hundred and thirty foot and 8 inches, befides the base or footfiall, which Augustus translated to Rome out of Hicropolisa City of Eappt but when he would have fet it up on end it fell down and brake in twain. This was hewen out of the quarry, by King Samnefreteus, in whoferaign Pythagoras was in Egypt.

The arch of Settinius in the Cirque. The place of the Tuberoes in the Cirque. The stews, the house of Pompey, and the sountain of Juturna.

Ertinias having made conpuelt of Spain, brought great flore of money into the City chamber: Dand of the spoils taken from enemies, he reared two arches; the one in the beast-market; called Forum Foarum; the other in the great shew-place, named Circus Maximus; Upon these arches he fet golden images, and other ornaments to beautifie them.

The house and family of the Helis was none of the wealthieft, but yet of great credit and effiestimation with the Romans, Among whom there was so great concord & unity, that 16 of them at one time dwelt and agreed well together in one and the same house. For their (ngular prowess and worthy acts they were allowed by the Senat and people of Rome a scaffold by themselves in all the shew-places and Theatres, to behold all fights and masteries of activity.

About the Circus Maximus flood the flews and brothel-houses, where sometimes harlots and naughty-packs kept, such as made profession of whordom, But this place was afterwards laid even with the ground, and is now a void place.

The house of Pomprius was near the Circus Max. & therein was the statue of Hercules erected, The fountain or well of the nymph Juturna, is yet (as some think) to be seen, boiling up in the V. labrum near the common finck or vault called Maxima.

CHAP. XVI. The Septizonium of Severus,

Here should follow by course after the great Cirque, the fixt part of the City, namely, the mount Calius, But because we meet with the Septizonium of Severus, & the arch of Constantine (before wecome to Calini) between it and the mount Palatine, something would first be spoken of them, especially being so excellent building as they are. The Septizanium therefore is a mighty mount or terrace raised from the plain ground 4 square, compatied about with seven articles, that is to fay, couries of rows of pillars one above another, yielding as it were as many porches of galieries : and in this order they are disposed, that the higher the pillars stand, the lesser and shorter they be. In the midst hereof four wals arise, containing within them certain hollow places like cabinets, In the rop thereof were bestowed and laid the ashes of Kings and Emperors deceased, Jul. Capitolinus nameth this mount Septodium, for the Greeks call places much frequented; whereunto many waies lead, Heptodia of arra,i.e. feven, and ISG i.e.a way. Pliny calleth it Septifolium, of feven lotts or folars. For in every coutle thereof the columns meet together in the head with marbles transomes. Other beams there be are befides, reaching inward from them to the mount it felf, To as every such course yielded a stage like a gallery or walking place. Two of these Septizonia we read there were at Rome, to wit, the one of Titus in the firest called Via nova, of right great antiquity, not far from this of Severus: of which at this day there is to be feen no fhew or token at all. The other of Severns, whereof there remain fill, ouer against S. Gregories Church 3 Zones or girdles (as it were) of curious work; for the beauty and statelines of the pillars worth the seeings and pleasant to behold. Reared it was in the broad street called Appia, and built by Severus himself, That which now is left thereof leaneth out fo, as it feemeth ever and anon ready to fall.

CHAP. XVII. The triumphant arch of Constantine the Emperor:

Hele triumphant arches were crected for them only, who having subdued whole Provinces or conquered forrain nations & obtained brave & fortunate victories, seemed worthy of triumph, and thereupon they are called Triumphant arches. Upon these arches for the perpetuall and everlasting memoriall of acts atchieved, were cut and engraven the portraitures of the very places where the war was performed; the refemblances of Fabricks and ranged battels, if the fervice was on land; and of thips if it were at fea, Howbeit, untill the time of the Emperors, no man raised any arches, and in Plinies daies they began first to be built: so as, that of Titus is of all others most ancient. For before their age, only statues and trophies were set up. But in process of time following, many of thele arches were raised: among which, that of Constantine is to be seen above the rell, et the corner of the mount Palatine near the Theate, beautified with thiumphall ornaments,

He mount Calius in old time was named Querquetulanus, for the number of oaks there growing but afterwards it was to called of one Calius Vibennis, a Duke of the Tulcan nation.unto whom the Romans granted a place in that mountain to inhabit. For when as the Tuscan people, by reason of their multitude, and the strong fenced places which they held, were suspected. commanded they were to remove into a street which of themselves was named Thusew, But such as were without infpition, kept the hill Caholus or Calicolus, i.e. the little Calins ; a place where sometime the goddess Diana was worshipped: and at this day there standeth the Chur h consecrated to S. Evangelista the virgin. This mountain afterwards by Tiberius was named Augustus.

> CHAP. XX. Of the Amphitheatres, and first of that of Statilius Taurus.

Now it followeth to speak of the Amphitheatre of Statilius Taurus, but before we write there-of, it would be briefly shewed what an Amphitheatre is. Now this word Amphitheatrem cometh sie & duoi, & secual, i.e. of looking round about : for two prospects joyned in one, make the form of an hemilphere or half circle, Some think, that Tim devised the Amphitheatre first, but some avow and prove that C. Cafar built the first that ever was in Mars field : but by the authority of Succonius it is proved, that Statilius reared one Amphitheatre before Titus.

In these Amphitheatres were prizes and rewards propounded to them that would fight with bealts. Condemned persons likewise yielded there to the eyes of men a horrible and feamillight to behold, for thither were those prisoners brought by the Lictors, within that enclosure to wrefile and maintain conflict with wild beafts.

Moreover, the Emperors before they took their journey to any war or expedition, exhibited unto the people in these Amphitheatres shews of sword-sencers at the sharp for life and death, to the end, that the fouldiers should be acquainted with fight, and learn not to be affraid of weapons of wounds, no nor of bloudfhed, norto draw back and avoid the perils of war to come for the novelty and strangeness thereof. A great part of Statilius his Amphitheatrum, is yet to be seen near the wals, at S. Croffes Church in Hierufalem. And at the sametime he built it, when Augustus Cefar encouraged and exhorted the Citizens of Rome, every man according to his ability to beautifie and adorn the City.

CHAR XXI.

The water conduits why they were devised, by what means waters were conveyed into the Gity, to what purpose, by whom first, and how many.

He City of Rome in the beginning as hath been faid in the first book, was but narrow of compais, and contained within imall bounds: and the people for commodity and flore of water, feeled upon the river Tyber. But as the city daily more and more encreased, necessary it was that fome should build them houses and habitation in one place, some in another, farther from the river: whereupon diffressed at was for want of water, which was to be fetched so far off, and that with great pain and labour : befides, those places which had no current of running waters to wash away the filth, and carry it into Tyber, became (by the noisome air which was infected with their loathfome and flinking finels) unwholfome; and fubject many timesto the peftilence. Prince Nerwatherefore (the Emperor) undertook to redress and remedy this mischief (and othersafter him by his example) and devise by the wit and subtile invention of men, conduit pipes, to bring water into those parts of the city which otherwise had none, And this verily they did two waies, the one by arched work, when by digging certain tills or rivulets the water was carried level above grounds forced by certain weights, ballales, and counterpoiles: the other by vaults under the ground, bringing water into the city by fecret under-waies through pipes, fpouts, and rocks. By which means it came to pais that in the city every where such flore there was of water that each house almost had a well in it. But especially at the bottom and foot of the hill Quirinalis; and all the fide thereof, in the freet Patricius, Suburra, the Latine way, the Aventine, the Jews freet, and in many other places: so as in this our age fullit is of such water-works under the ground Now were these waters conveighed from divers places, and some conduits especially, such as were devised by arches were higher or lower than other. In the beginning and all the former times, there weref by report) five heights or depths: The highest of all was new Anio; next, the waters Claudia; in the third place the water Julia; Tepula in the fontth ; then Martia, and after it old Anio, the levell or current whereof, Virgofolloweth and Appia, and the lowest of all others, Alliesina, which ferves that quarter of the city beyond Tyber, and other low places built upon the plain. These waters were first brought into certain great conduit-heads, and from thence they were by a certain measure diffributed by the conduit officer, and for an into places appointed. Now that great conduit head was called Caftellum, which receiveth first the common water, and afterwards lendeth it out into divers and fundry parts: and the keeper or officer that overfeeth it is named Coffellarins. There were besides levell or above ground certain cisterns or receptacles of water, which kept water to serve curriers, fullers, and other such artificers for their necessary use. Over these waters were appointed certain wardens and keepers, and a fer number of labourers and workmen to fee thereto. Finally, a grievous punishment was to be inflicted upon them that either marred and hurt the conduit-beads, or derived and conveyed water to other places than the laws or publike ordinances, or the Cenfors or Ediles permitted; or took more water than at the first was allowed them. Appins Claudias (by report) was the first man that brought water into the city by arched work, But of the Roman waters, of the conduits, and other matters ordained thereabout, of the manner of conveyance, the inftruments, measures, and weights thereto belonging, read Frontinus, who of these things hath written truly and at large. Also have recourse to Sex. Ruffus, who of the same argument hathmade a good treatile. In the time of Frontinus there were but nine waters and no more brought into the City, namely, Appia,old Anie, Martia, Tepula. Julia, Virgo, Alfierana, called also Augusta, Claudia, and new Anio, Ruffus reckoneth ten more, whereby it appeareth, that he wrote long after Frontinus.

> CHAP, XXII. The conduit or conveyance of Aqua Claudia.

Alignia began two conduits, but left them unfinished when he died, Claudius the Emperor of Jiamous memory, took them in hand again, and in most magnificent manner made an end. To the one of them, namely, which beginning at the fources of forings called Carsteins and Curtius, was drawn to the City, he gave the name Aqua Claudia: the other, for difference fake of the two conduits of Anie he called his own, or the new Anie; and diffinct it was from that which is named old Anio, The water Claudia therefore was brought from the gate Navia, along the fide of the mount Caline into the Avenine, A part alio thereof Caracalla derived into the Capitoli hill, > CHAP, XXIII. Of those things which now in mount Colius are not known where they stood.

Retain the Conful having expelled Tarquine, built a Temple to the goddes Carna in mount Calina, to which goddes also upon the accomplishment of his prayer and vow, he offered sacrifice. They in old time supposed that she had power over the vital members of the body and to hersuition they committed those parts, and that the should preserve them safe, they did sacrifice upon her altars, and prefented oblations.

Agrippina likewife began to build a Temple to Claudius Cafar, which after her death Vespasian finished, and Nero utterly destroyed to the very foundation this also was erected in the same hill. Mamorra Formianus, Mafter of Cafars Carpenters in France, was the first Roman that adorned and fer out his house which he had in Calins bill with marble rough-cast. Moreover, the house of Clandins Centimalis Rood upon the faid hill. Also the house of the Tetritici. who were two of the thirty tyrants. Likewise the house of Isniar Senator, wherein, when as all other edifices and buildings upon that mountain were confumed with fire the image of Tiberius remained unhurr. There also it is said of Tiens Claudius Clypens, the maker of hymns. In this hill was the great Macellum, the cave or den of Cyclops, the Spoliarium, and the armory.

CHAP. XXIV. The waies Apple, and Nove. The Temples of Itis, Vertue, Honour, Quirinus of Mass, and the river Almo.

Now follow those places which are worth the remembrance upon the hill Callus toward the Aventine, And therefore the way or fireet called Apple we meet with first, which taking the beginning from the arch of Constantine, reacheth as far as Brundusium: and because afterwards was paved and repaired by Garacalla, it took the name of Nova, i.e. the new causey. But that which properly is called Nova beginneth at the gate of Palatine, and along the foot of the Palatine hill. over the great Cirque called Maximus Aretcheth out as far as to the loweft fifth-pool, where now Standeth the Church of S. Sixtus. Many other streets there were, called Nova. Take heed therefore that in their names you be not deceived, and left ye think that to be spoken of one, which oftentimes was meant of many,

Between the Church of Sixtus, the Fish-pools, and the ruins of the Antonian bains, there was the Church of Isis Antenodorica, built by Antonius Baffianus.

The Temple of Honour and Vertue, not far from the freet Appia, was vowed by the father of Marcus Marcellus at Claftidium in Gaul; and seventeen years after dedicated by his fon Mar-

Two Temples there were of Mars, one called the Temple of Quirinus within the City, near to the gate of that name, the other upon the way Apple without the City.

The river Almo runneth along the way Appia, under the foot of the Aventine into the Taker It beginneth ten miles from the City in the territory Marinum; which commonly afterwards they called the river of Appins. In this river the goddess named the mother of the gods, was every year wont to be washed by her Priests, called Galli.

> CHAP, XXV. Of baths and bains in generall.

் Herma properly hath the fignification from a Greek word, சேடியர், which betokeneth hot. But we use to call those places which either having hot waters, or without them are heat with a flouph, appointed either to wash and bath, or to sweat, by the Greek name Therma. That the Romansuled in old to bath and wash themselves oftner than we now adaies, is testified by many and divers authorities of writers : and for fundry causes they were wont so to do [as yet the manper is amongst us] namely, to scour away sweat, or to wash dust off, in like fort for health and pleafure: whereby it came to pais, that every man, if he were but of mean wealth, had in a manner a privat bath or hot-house by himself: but the same were devised and contrived after divers and fundry forts. For many publike baths there were ordained for the common people to use at their pleafure, Serv. Orata invented first and made the pendant or hanging baths. But after that riot and funerfluity abounded in excess, the bathing houses were built with wonderfull cost and magnificence, so as they seemed to keep no mean nor measures appeareth by the very reliques and mins thereof at this day, And those places where they built these bains and hot-houses they called Therme; which contained within them divers places, and an infinit number of roomes, bearing fundry names, and ferving to as many uses. For some were appointed to heat water (and those were round built) from whence hot water was let into the bains, not to them only that were on the ground beneath, but also to those which were pendant and hanging aloft: which water after they had done washing, being foul and good for nothing was conveyed by certain pipes and spouts into finks. They had other rooms also called Apoditeria, wherein they that were to go into the bath put off their cloaths and laid them by. In the same places were court-yards, having about them most spacious porches or cloisters, built with arched and embowed roofs most stately; wherein were marble pillars, garnished with divers and fundry colours. In like manner pavements of stone, and walls feeled and hung with marble tables. Also close walking galleries, groves, and swimming places, all for the pleasure and contentment of the people, where they might refresh and solace themselves. These delights so drew and allured mens minds, as that they would wash oftensimes in one day, yea, and in these bains the Princes were wont to sup and bath with other persons wholoever, as it fell out. They had besides private baths to themselves most sumpty ouilt, and gorgeously set out. And namely, Amoninus Caracalla, at his own charges edified certain baths, which by his name were called Therma Antonina. The huge snins thereof are yet to be feen : some of the pillars fill fland, others are thrown down. Some fay, they were begun only by Antoninus. but finished and adorned by Severus. They stood about the foot of the Aventine pear the streetway leading to Ardea, where now is the Church of S. Balbina, Under these baths there flood a most goodly Palace, built by the same Antoninus, but at this day there is scarce any example or shere

The fifth Book.

He Aventine is of the Roman hils the fourth in order. The compass and form whereof. because we have already described in the first book, needless here it is to repeat. But it remaineth to declare, how it came so called, what Temples of the gods, and what other edifices be therein. The Aventine therefore, somethink, took the name of birds which were wont to flie unto this hill, there to neftle: others, of a * King of the Albans, flain and buried * Authings. there. There be again who suppose, that the Sabins, who being by the Romans enfranchised Citizens, there letled and made abode gave the name to this hill of Avantes, a river in their Province. Varro affirmeth that it was so called of a ferriage: For as it hath been said a little before, this mount was divided from the rest, and from the City by certain lakes and the Tyber, whereupon, they that would go to it used to ferry over in small punts or wherries. Some guels, that it came to have that name of refort unto it, for that the Latines used in great frequency to repair unto the holy Temple of Diana there. Remarins also it was named of Remus who chose a place in the top thereof to firstor to take the flight of birds for Augury, and in the end was there enterred : Romulus therefore commanded that it should not be inhabited, because he would have had it wholly consecrated to his brother. This hill Ancus Martius afterward compassed with a wall, and granted leave to as manyas would there to dwell: howfoever, there be fome that think it flood void untill the time of Clauding the Emperor of happy memory, as being an ominous place and unfortunat, by reason of foul birds that hanted it, and therefore not to be received within the wals. But the truth is, when the Romans grew populous, they joyned this mountain also to the rest of the City.

CHAP, II.

The Temples of Diana, Dea bona, Hercules Victor, Queen Juno, Moneta, Luna, Victory, Minerya, and Liberty. The Altar of Jupiter Elicius.

N the top of mount Aventine toward the Tyber, there standeth the Church of S. Sabina, that very place where aforetime was the holy chappel of Diana, The feast and holiday of bondslaves was wont to be kept at Rome the thirteenth day of August, for upon that day Servius Tullius, whose mother was a bond-woman, consecrated a Temple to Diana in Aventine, and ordained it to be a feastival day for bond-fervants, who as yet were patronized by Diana, Somethink that this chappel was built by K. Ancus of that money which the Citizens conferred and contributed, who lately had been translated thither from Politorium. This Temple was common unto all the Latines, whereupon oftentimes they reforted thereunto.

Very near unto that place stood the Church of S. Mary, called Aventina, But in times past the place was confectated to the goddels Bona, i.e.good. For Claudia a vestall virgin or Nun, built a chappel unto her in the honour of Fatua, * fifter of Faunus, a most chaste maid.

Upon the same bank and brow of the hil, where at this day S. Alexius Church standeth, was some-daughter. time the Temple of Hercule; Conqueror. And near unto it another of Juno Regina, built by Camillus with the pillage got in Veis. In the ruinat place of Decius the Emperors bains there was a Temple also of Hercules, where the Christians afterwards confectated a Church to S. Prifea.

On the fide of the Aventine hill stood the chappel likewife of the Moon, as Ovid doth witness. Thus much of those buildings in the Aventine, which had a certain place thereupon in our knowledge: the reft following were doubtlefs in the Aventine, but in what part thereof they flood, it is unknown after to long time, and namely, the Temple of Victory built by the Arcadians, and in honour of whom they offer facrifice yearly. Minervia and June had their Temples there in the same hill, by the testimony of approved authors. To Liberty a Temple was built and dedicated by the father of T. Gracebus, with the money taken for fines and forfeitures. The cloifter belonging to that Temple was by Llins Parus and Cornelius Cethegus Cenfors repaired and enlarged, and last of all by Pollie also re edified Now this S. Liberty the Romans honoured above all others and in defence and maintenance thereof, they ever thewed themselves most resolute and constant.

Upon the same hill, Numa reared the altar of Japiter Elicius, so called ab eliciando, i.e. of fetching out fecrets and hidden mysteries.

In like manner there food an old altar of Murcea in that hill Now they named Venus Murcea, of the Myrtle tree confecrated unto her; or as some interpret, because Venus, immoderate and excelfive, maketh a man to be Murcus or Murcidus, i.e. fluggish, floathful, idle, and good for nothing.

The Temple of Juno Moneta was likewise built and dedicated upon that hill.

Camillus in the same mount consecrated a chappel to dame Matura.

The wood or grove, also called Laurentum or Laurentina, consecrated unto Jupiter, was there: in which Emperor Valentinian [the second] son of Constantine, and Galla Placidia was slain, as Pling winneffeth.

CHAP. III. Cacus, and his hole or Cave.

Acm, by report of the Poets, was the fon of Vulcan, whom they believed in old rime to breath out of his mouth fire and smoak, This Cacus infested the places near unto him with robbing and spoiling. But more probable it is, that he was a most lewed and theevish servant of Ewand mand therefore the Arcadians called him kando, i.e. naught. A cave he hanced, as by very good conjectures is certainly gathered, in Aventine toward Tyber, over-against the Church of S. Mary Aventing, whereas the river runneth nearest to the hill, and whereas there hangeth over a vast and huge criggy rock, as fit a place as might be to make a flarting hole and cave for fach an one, and near it is to the gate Trigemina. Him when Horender had killed and facrificed, he reared an altar unto Jupiter Inventer, near to the faid cave or den.

CHAP. IIII. The Armilustium, and some other things in generall.

Rmilustrium was a place where fouldiers shewed themselves and their armor, and where the Aufed to multer; where also in their arms they facrificed and did fervice to their gods, with refounding loud trumpets. Some would have it to be in the Aventine, others in the Cirque Maximu: but that matters not much. Hither the fouldiers used to repair when they were returned from war, and here they laid up their harness and weapons. For armor of their own and in their privat cultody the Romans had not, to use in the wars: but delivered all up to be kept lafe either in the Armilufrium, or the tower or castle upon the rock Tarpeia.

In Aventine, near the Temple of Juno Regina, were the Scala Gemonia, that is to lay, a fleepplace with a downfall; where wicked malefactors,,drawn with a crook, were most milerably executed and killed.

There flood sometime this hill, near the Temple of Diana, the house of Phyllis.

A part of this mountain was called Remuria; which Remu chose to dwell in : and being there by his brother Romulus committed to the earth, he gave it his name.

The Senat and people of Rome built in this mountain, to the honour of Decius the Emperor, the baths called Deciana and others also near them, named Variana. Moreover, the bains of Trajan were in this place, where now the vineyard of Francis Albertinus is.

The caves of Faunus and Picus also were in the Aventine, as fables report. Italus likewise dwelt in the Aventine, as M. Cato recordeth.

The Temples and edifices of this hill all in generall were (by report) burnt in the daics of Tiberius sometime Emperor.

CHAP. V. The sheard hill, and other things within that compass:

Title plain and levell ground between Aventine; Tyber, and the City wall, hath four fides, but uneven; in which there rifeth a little hill, commonly called Testaceus. The whole compass hereof will hardly be measured with 2000 paces; the height is about 160 foot. It resembleth in fhew the form of a gourd; and the one fide of it which regardeth the Tyber is broader than the other. Near to this hill was the glass-makers street (and the potters) also the carpenters habitation, And no man doubteth, but hereupon arole and grew the mount called Tefraceus. For in old time, at Rome and elsewhere, as also in some places now adaies, much use there was commonly of earthen vessels made by potters: which even by this may be certainly collected, for that in Numa's daies there were four colledges or focieties of potters : and these made of clay, not only vessels, but also the images of the gods, and ornaments to beautifie and set out their Temples: pillars and wals were by potters work feeled in the outfide, nay, the very dead bodies were bestowed in cophins of baked clay. Since then, in so great flore of earthen vessels and potters work, much of necessity must needs be broken, which if they had been cast abroad in the corn-field and pasture grounds would have made all barren and unfruitful; again, if they had been thrown into the water, would in time have choaked up the chanell of the current, and forced the river to swell and overflow the banks: Numa therefore commanded this kind of workmen to dwell in one place, and gave order to fling all that was good for nothing, as filth, riff-raff, and broken sheards into one place: whereupon, in process of time arose a mount which they called Testaceus. Among these potters there was a place hallowed to Venus Myrtea, as we find in some records.

CHAP. VI. The Pyramides ; the sepulchre of C. Cestius, and the garners of the people of Rome.

He Pyrmides were huge towers four-square, rising up in height, sharp like to a slame, whereof I they have the name sm Tu's muede, i.e. of fire. But Stephanus inpposeth they were so called, sm าสัง าบรูลง, i.e. of wheat, because into that place where they were erected, wheat was brought out of all Egypt; which made a great dearth of corn. These at the beginning were reared by the Kings of Egypt, thereby to spend and consume their superfluous wealth and substance, whereof they had no ule; for tear left if they had gathered goods, and he ped up a deal of gold filver, and other riches, they should thereby have given occasion unto some for to lie in wait to take their lives away : also, that the common people should not live in idleness. Afterwards, at Rome likewife they bestowed their money thereupon, for to make the world wonder, and to shew their vain-glory. There is yet one of them to be feen, flanding upright at the gate Hoftienfis. enclofed within a wall. And commonly it is faid, that it was the monument or sepulchre of C. Cestime, one of the leven Septemvirs, called Epulones. But Blondus would feem to prove, that it was the place for buriall of the whole Colledg and Society of thole Septemvirs Epulones. Now were they called Epilones, who had the power to ordain and make feafts and folemn bankets to the

It is written, that there were 140 garners of the people of Rome, between the mount Telfaceus and Tybre.

In the same compass of ground near Tyber was the lake or pool Hylerna. Some also affirm, that there stood iometime in that quarter a little town called Capena.

CHAP, VII. The sweating steeple, and the image of Jupiter.

PY courfe the Equitie thould next follow: but because it lieth between the way Labicana on the Southeast hat and the valley (which for the breadth of 400 foot encloseth that way) on the West; we will rehearle what memorable things soever there be in the Labican way and the valley aforesaid before we come to the mount Esquilia. In our return therefore to the triumphall arch of Conftantine, whereof we spake before, we will as we go discourse of the rest. Near then unto this arch there appeareth the half rundle or circumference of an old steeple made of brick; which Vittor ; alleth the sweating steeple : for that the report goeth, how sometime there gushed water out of it; whereby the common people, standing to behold the games and plaies in the next scaffolds of the Theatre until they were sthirft quenched their drought.

In the top hereof flood the brazen image of Jupiter, because their ancestors in old time were wont when they made folemn leagues to use the image of Jupiter. But for that it was a trouble either to carry with them or to fend the faid image, especially if they were to contract and establish any accords in far remote countries, therefore instead of the complear image they took the scepter only; which might betoken Jupiter the King of the gods, as well as if he had been there present full and whole.

CHAP. VIII.

The Amphitheatre of Titus Vespasianus. The Temples of Fortune and Quies.

The Etween the two hils Calina and Elquilia was there an Amphitheatre. This Vefta fian built first. Dand afterward Titus his fon dedicated and beautified it with the bains, built near unto it with right great celerity and speed. This Amphitheatre was commonly called Coloffeum, of Nero's Collof-(w, which was fet up in the porch of Nero's house. In the same place of the Theatre were the pooles beforetime of Nero, whereof we will speak hereafter in this very book. This Amphitheatrum they called also Arena, i.e. the Sand-floore, because the ground was spread over and laid with fand that the wreftlers might fall fofter and take less hurt, also that the bloud should be drunk up. to the end that the fword-fencers in combat might not be affraid upon the fight thereof, and fo with less chearfulness and courage let upon their concurrent; and last of all, that the champions. whose bodies were anointed with oyl, being bestrewed with the fand, might with more ease take hold one of another. The whole Theatre and place it felf within (which during those daies of the games was covered over with tent-cloath) would receive 80000 men. But hereof fee more in Pliny, Pompeius Latus, and other writers of the Roman acts.

Fulvius Flaceus built unto Fortune (fast by this Amphicheatre) so goodly a Temple, as for state and magnificence there was hardly another in all Rome comparable anto it. Befides it there were many other chappels at Rome confectated to Fortune.

CHAP. IX. Of Esquilix.

The mount Equilie as well by Varro as others, is divided into many parts, and each part there-of took name of those captains who in times past, before the City of Rome was built, there inhabited. For one was called Cifius, another, Oppius, and a third, Septius. But hereof Varro writeth at large. The posterity following changed those names, as we shall hereafter hear. Some think that Esquilie took the name of Excubia, i.e. watch and ward. For when Romalus had no very great truch in Tation, he used to have a standing watch by night for fear he should be secretly sorlaied and killed, or else turned out of his kingdom. Others suppose it was so named of soulers, who there used to cast forth chaff, and such refuse of light corn, to beguile and catch the poor birds. The

The fide of the hill toward the broad way Labicana, which lieth between the Churches of the 40 martyrs of S. Clements, S. Peter in Vinculia, and S. Not far from thence, in the year of our Lord 1 506 one Falix a Citizen of Rome, chanced to find in his vineyard the statue of Lascoon, made by those excellent workmen, Age fander Polydorus and Athenodorus, Rhodians, who with wonderful cunning portraied and cut most artificially in one intire frome, Laccoon himself, his children and the admirable windings and foldings of the serpents about them. And now at this day is to be feen at the Vatican, in the palace of Vaftafin near the faid bains of Titas, See more of this you may in Pliny. As for the flory it felf, molt learnedly and lively it is fet out by Virgil, and there to be read, Behind thefe bains of Titus, between East and North the ruins of others befides are thought verily to be those of Philip the Emperor.

There were to it belonging bolts and hamlets country-like, vineyards pastures, woods, and beasts both tame and wild, of all torts, The house and the porches were double guilded all over, and fet out with precious stones. CHAP, XIV.

The eliff Subuttanus; the arch of Galienus; the shambles or flesh-market of Livia, or, as some would have it, Livianum; the Praneftine way, and the Trophees of Marius,

AT the top or upper end of Suburra was the Clivus Suburranus, so called of Suburra, yielding an easie ascent from thence up into the Esquilia.

Anon you meet with the triumphal arch of Galten the Emperor (where now standers the Church of S. Viens) making a goodly shew of the Tiburtine stone, whereof it was made. Near unto it was the fambles or market-place, called Macellum Livia, or Livianum. This, as some think, took the name of one Macellus; who being a notorious thief, and practifing much to feal into the City, was in the end apprehended, and by the Cenfors condemned: and his house being seized as confiscat to the City was converted to a place wherein they fold meat and all other victuals; and fo it kept fill the name (as is faid) of Mabellum. Some are of opinion, that the faid house was pulled down, and another built in the ruins thereof, which retained the name fill of the former.

From hence beginneth the port-way Pranestina, and leadeth to the gate Esquilina.

In this way you shall meet on the right hand with a huge bank of brick, helf ruinat upon which were erected two Trophies of marble a that is to lay, certain polis like Quintins [danding upright with spoils of enemies hanging the reupon; and they resembled men that were taken prisoners. It is faid, that these Trophees were set up by Marius in his triumph for the Cimbrian war: which when Syllahad cast down and overthrown, C. Cafar (afterwards Dictator) erected again. The place of the inhabitants thereabout, is at this day called Cimbrum, As touching Trophecs, look to readmore in Plutareh Valerius Max, and others.

The house of the Elii : the chappel Mariamum : the region or quarter called Tabernola ; the bains and dwelling house of Gordian; the Palace of Cains and Lucius; also the Palace Licinianum.

The house of the Lis flood in that place where now be the monuments Mariana and the chappel of that name.

The plain part of the Efquilia, between it and the mount Calius, and the Bafilica Lateranenfis, is at this day called Merulana, for Mariana; and in old time, the region of Tabernola.

Near the Church of S. Eusebius, in the way of Pranestina, was built the bains and habitation of Gordianus. The ruins of those hot-houses are yet to be seen, whereby a man may soon give an estimat, how fair, how stately, and large they were at first.

Between the gates Equilina and Navia, not far from the walls, there be to be feen certain notable ruins: this they commonly call, the bains of Galutius. But in that place stood, in old time, that beautiful and famous palace which Cafar erected under the name of Cains and Lucius his nephews. Hard by the Church of S. Balbina, whereas now is the Bear called Pilearns, flood sometime the Palace Licinianum.

CHAP. XVI. The water Martia or Trajana; and the Temple of Isis.

The current of the water Martia, passing by the gate Trajana through the plain of Esquilian went as sar as to the bains of Divelesian, unto the hils next adjoyning. This in old time was called Aufera. It arifeth out of the spring Piconia in the mountains of the Peligni, and passeth by the Martians country and the lake Fucinus, and fo runneth to Rome; the coldest and most wholfome of all other waters that run into Rome. This water Anem Martin began first to bring into the City: afterward, Q. Martine furnamed Rex, took it in hand; and a long time after Agrippatepaired the conduit thereof. Of it read more in Pliny and Frontinu.

The Temple of Isis is by P. Vittor placed in the quarter Esquilina.

CHAP. XVII.
Of Suburra; the honse of Catar and Lalia; and the street Patricius.

Cuburra is a freet of all other most frequented: it beginneth at the Forum Romanum, and goeth Don forward directly by the Forum Nerva up to the hanging or rising of the hill called Chou Suburranns, whereof we have written before in this book; and it endeth where the way Pranclina beginneth. Called it was Suburra, either for that it instained and bare up the Corine and the wall under it: or because it lay under the old City : or as Varro thinketh, of the burrough or fireer Succufanue. In this freet Suburra was the house of Cafar, so long ashe contented himself with a mean elfate.

In it were sometimes certain stews and brothel-houses, as Martial writeth.

The fireet Patritius windeth crooked from the hill Viminalis, and endeth at the bains of Dielefian. Of it more hath been faid in the former book.

The house of Lalia likewise was in the same street, as Martial witnesseth.

CHAP. XVIII. Subburra in the Plain; and the Temple of Sylvanus.

"He mount Viminaly on the Well-fide of it hath part of the Quirinal's opposite against it: and the vale lying between was named Suburra the plain.

In the lame valley in times past were the ten Taberna; fo called of the number,

The pit alfo of S. Proba was in the same hill; which Proba her self made near to the Church of S. Maries in the field.

At the foot inmanner of the hill Viminalis, over-against S. Agatha's Church there stood the Temple of Sylvanus, as appeareth by many good tokens.

CHAP. XIX, siq Of the hill Viminalis; the Palace of Decius; the Laver of Agrippina; the bains of Olympias and Novatus; the dwelling houses of Q. Catulus, Crasius, and C. Aquilius.

Arroreckoneth the hill Viminalia among the Efquilia. Viminalia it was named of Jupiter Vimineus, whose alters were in that hill: or else of plenty of Ofiers there growing.

In the highest rising and ascent of that hill, there stood in old time, (where now is the Church of S. Laurence in Panif-perna) the Palace of Decime the Emperor, as may be shewed by the ruins thereof.

Not far from the same place, toward the Church of S. Vitalis, were the lavers or washing places of Agripping mother to Nero.

The bains of Olympias were fituat toward Subarra; the tokens whereof are now found in the brow of the hill.

Likewise the bains of Novatus were built upon the hill Viminalis, where the Church of S. Prudence Standeth. The hill Viminalis had also three goodly houses of most noble personages, to wit of M. Crassis Quintus Catulus, and Cains Aquilius: the marks whereof are evident to be feen in the fide of the

Upon the same hill in times past a certain feastivall factifice was solemnized, which the dwellers and inhabitants there, call Fagut al. CHAP. XX.

The bains of Dioclesianus; the Library Ulpia; the plain Viminalis; the gate Interaggetes; and the vale Quirinalis.

The bains of Dioclesian are to be seen all ruinat on the side of the hill Vincinalis: and by their ruins a man may easily gather how stately and magnificent they were sometime. These were begun by Dioclesian and Maximinian Herculanus: in the building whereof 40 000 Christians were held to work many years together in most slavish manner.

These were afterwards finished and dedicated by Cor stantine and Maximinian new Emperors. Of the vain and superfluous expences which the Romana laid out upon Bains, read Seneca, who depainteth out their wastiulness most excellently In the same bains was the Library Upia, which by Hadrian, or (as some think) by Trajon was thither translated; wherein were the linen records, and those huge volumes, called the Elephantine books in which the acts of the Emperors, and all the fanctions and ordinances of Junit were, as Pollio witneffeth. Behind

Behind these bains, from above the rampier or bulwark of Tarquinius Superbus, was the plain field Viminalis, which spreadeth out as far as to the City wall. There is seen as yet the gate Interaggeres shut; albeit it seemeth more probable and like to a truth, that it stood in the plain Es.

In that very place there was a pit or well of spring running water, which the neighbours dwelling thereby called the pit of the Vivariam, or the park pit, within which park they kept enclosed divers and fundry kinds of wild beafts. The harbors and dens of these wild beafts are yet to be feen : whereupon it cometh, that those places or parks which are fet out and appointed for feeding of Deer, we use to call Vivaria.

The space between Dioclesians baths and Constantines arch is named the vale Quirinalis: in which they fay, that Romules met with Procelus.

CHAP. XXI.

The mount Caballus : the Etymology of Quirinalis : the tower Militiatum : the bains of Paulus : the chappell of Neptune : the bains of Constantine : the house and street of the Cornelii.

THe hill which at this day they name Caballus was in old time called Quirinalis, as by many I figns and reasons may be proved; to as no man skilfull in the Roman story, need to doubt

This Quirinall hill, the fixt in order of the mountains of Rome, (as Varrotellifieth) taketh that name of the Temple of Quirinus after others, of the Quirites, who coming with Tatins from Cores. there pitched their tents and lodged. This mountain is shaped long, for it comprehended that lite tle hill which is between the gate Collina and Collatina, Upon it standeth the Obelisk of the Moon, engraven with Ægyptian hieroglyphick characters. In breadth, from the North Southward, it reacheth to a tower now called Comitium.

In the pitch and top of the hill above the Forem of Trajanns, you shall see the tower called Mie litiarum; where in oid time the fouldiers of Trajan kept their standing guard, and gave the tower that name.

On the same ridg were the bains of Paulus built: which place at this day by a corrupt name, is called Bagnana- Poli.

In the descent and hanging of the Quirinall hill toward Suburrastood sometime the chappell of Noprane, which appearsh by the pictures and other reliques there found.

From hence toward the North were the hot-houses of Constantine, as the ruins of the place do

The house of the Cornelis was built in the Areet so called, and at this day the name it keepeth fill But more hereof ellewhere.

CHAP. XXII.

The Temples of Saturn the Sun, and Bauchus; Quirinus his Temple and porch; the old Capitoll; the Chappels of Jupiter Juno, and Minerva; the house of Pomponius Atticus.

N the Cornelian freet (whereof a little before we made mention) were two gyant-like images; I called Goloffi retembling two o.d men, naked and holding Cornucopia in their hand. It is commonly received, that there were the flatues of Saturn and Mars; for that certain it is how their Temples flood hard by : and many evidences there are befides the very ruins thereof, which teftifie fo much.

Over-against the hot-houses of Confiantine, upon the very brow of the hill, there standeth to be feen one half of a marble tower, which the people dwelling thereby call Mefa. This, men think, was the tower of the Sun by the ordanishts there reared and fet up by Aurelian: for this Empetor worthipped the Sun above all other gods; and therefore you shall see stamped in his coin this. inscription; Soli invitto, To the inviposible Sun, His mother alio, a Priest of the Sun, thereupon reared a Temple unto the Sun.

In the fide of the hill near the foresaid baths are two horses seen standing; the handy-work of Praxiteles and Phidias. These were (by report) Tiridates the Kings, and translated to Rome.

That part of the Quirinalis which boundesh upon Vallis Martia was called the mount and Temple of Clatra and Apollo.

Not far from thence behind this hill, there is another rising and ascent; where, by antique letters it is evident, that the old Capitoll flood, together with the chappel of Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva. Over-against these places, enclining toward the right hand, where now standeth the Church of S. Vestalit. Pomponius Attions dwelt in an house which came to him by inheritance from his grandfire; and was called Pamphiliana, They write, that this was a most sweet and pleasant seat, by reafon of a wood near unto it.

In the same place was built afterwards the Temple of Quirinus, kept alwaies shut, to signific that it was an unknown fecret; whether Romulus were enterred and lay in the earth, or were translated into the number of the gods in he ven.

There was a porch or walking place there of that name; where folk used commonly to meet, to dispatch businesses and contract espousals.

The path-way or causey called Alta; the house of Sabinus; the street and statue of Mamurrus; the Court and gardens of Saluft, and the field or plain Sceleratus.

He high cauley reaching from the baths of Constantine to the gate Viminalis along the fide of 1 Q sirinalis was paved with foursquare stone. Upon that causey, at a place called the Pomgranat, Flavius Sabinus had an house, wherein, by report, Domitian was born.

It is avouched in old time there was a fireet of Mamurrus: and that his statue there sood where now is S. Su fans Church.

Not far from that Church was the Court of Saluft, and his most neat and fine hortyards, where the field called Sceleratus lay, and reached near the gate Collina. Of those hortyards, as also of the hamlet Tiburtina, there yet continue some marks and remnants in the bottom of the valley, between the very hill and the way which bringeth to the gate Salaria. On that little hill is feen the very house of Salust, which the people there inhabiting call Salustrium. Of this matter see more in Cicero and others.

Beyond the hortyards of Saluft, near the gate Collina, there is an high place like a mount where in times past the vestall votary Nuns, such as were condemned for incontinency and incest, were buried quick; and thereupon all the plain about it was called Sceleratus, together with the way that leadeth thereto. .

CHAP. XXIV.

The Temples of Salus, of Dius, Fidius, of Fortuna Primigenia, of Honor, Hercules, and Quirinus; alfo the Senat-house of women.

He mount Quirinalis had very many Temples & Chappels, although the certain place where they stood is not so well known at this day, namely, one of Apir, That of Salus was painted by Fabine Pictor, and burnt in the time of Claudine. By Junime Bubulone Dictator when he mumphed over the Equians it was vowed: by him (Cenfor) put to making, and in his fecond Dictatorship dedicated.

* Santim Dim, and Fiding, were the Sabins gods, which, when they left their native country and home, with all their other houshold gods, they carried with them into mount Quirinalis. This god (forfooth) was in words and name three, in deed and truth but one, as they faid. Thele three therefore had one temple built them upon this hill, and were called by one name, Santhus, The opinion received of which godhead was such, that an oath was thought to carry a great power offanctity and holiness, whereby a man in that threefold name and one Deity, avowed and fware thus Ma Dius Fidius.

Domitianus, a Prætor or Lord Chief Justice within the City of Rome, built a Temple upon that hill to Fortuna Primigenia.

Besides in that mount were the Temples of Honor and Hercules.

Likewise the Council-House of women was in the mount Quirinalis, at which in formet times the wives and dames of the City met yearly upon certain solemn set daies.

Moreover, it is recorded, that the feast Agonalia was celebrated in Quarinalis.

The Court or Forum Archimonium ; the pullar Tiburtina ; the house of Martial; the Cirque of Floralia ; the Temple of Flora ; the (hops of Minium, and the common ascent called Clivus Publicus.

Etween the hill Horrulorum (whereof ye may read before in the first book and the chapter Dnext following) and Quirinalis there is a valley fourfquare, but lying somewhat in length. In that part thereof which lieth under the mount of Clara and Apollo; was the Court called Archimonium. For the very Church of S. Nicholas, which at this day standeth upon that place is named De Archimoniis.

Not tar from it there is another place, to wit, Pila Tiburtina: There food the house of Martial, as he himself witheffeth.

Next to it followeth the round Cirque (Floralium) where yearly to the honour of the goddess Flora, the feastivall Floralia is celebrated. Now this Flora was a famous curtezan or ftrumpet at Rome, who having by her whorish trade gathered a mighty deal of goods together, in her last will made the people of Rome her heir, with this condition, That every year they should celebrate the memorial of her birth day. But the Senat thinking this aridiculous mockery, to honour and dignifie fo fi thy a thing with such a remembrance, they devised a goddess of flowers, for sooth, called Flora, and her upon those holidaies they seemed to please and content, that she would be good to the growth of trees and corn, and that they might do well in their flowring and blooming time. To this goddels we read that a Temple likewife was confectated: Anonyou meet with the workhouses where they make Minium, i.e. Vermilion, Near unto which was the Clivus Publicus. CHAP. "His little hill(Hortulorum)containeth but a few things worth the writing. Among which is the house of Piveille a Senator, who gave the name both to a gate and a mountain, which in thefe daies are called, Mount Pincing, and gate Pinciana.

The reliques and marks of his house are seen in that very place, near the old wall. And about the same wals we meet with an huge building in form of an hemisphere or half circle, which men imagine, was the Temple of the Sun.

Of the flat plot of the City, and the Theatre in generall.

Hat it may be understood more certainly in what place of the plain and levell part of the City every thing stood, let there be a streight and right line drawn from the Capitoll, through Pantheen to Tybre, near the Church of S. Rach. So shall the City be in manner divided into two equal parts. The one shall lie from the front and side of the Tyber, the other from the Forum of Trajanus to the gate Flumentana, along the foot of the two hils Quirinalis and Hortulorum.

Begin we will therefore at the Theatre of Marcelin, and recount the places in order, as hitherto we have done, As for Thearum, a Greek word it is and in Latine may be aprly translated Viforium, The first Theatres were appointed among the Athenians, and those in regard of husbandmen, who on feltivall daies visited the Temples of the gods: afterwards, at Rome they began to be taken up, The first, and that the greatest of all others was built of timber by M. Scaurus: for, the concavity within would receive 80000 men. After it, were Theatres made to turn about and and shew their front one while this way, another while that. But as touching Theatres, see more in Cassiodorus and Vitruvias, who have written plenteously thereof, and namely, by whom they were first ordained, and in what manner built,

> CHAP, II. The Theatre of Marcellus and the Library: the gallery and court of Octavia;

A "guilim built manythings under the name of others, as we find written by authors in fundry works. And among the relt was the Theatre of Marcellus his nephew or country his fifter Offavia. A part hereof is get to be feen between the Capitall and Tiber, where now standesh the palace of the Sabelli. It was able to contain 80000 men. See more thereof in Assault.

Hard by the very fame Theatre was the gallery of Ottavia, reated by the faid Augustus for his sifler Off-avia's fake. Therein were certain curious pieces of work wrought by Frantieles, and namely, the ravifning of Proferpina. The portraiture of Bacelou & Sayrus, Allo Apollo, Diana, and thenine mules, the workmanthip of Timarchides. Within this gallery of walking place, Pliny faith, there flood a chappel of June, and the image of the faid goddels. Fast by the faid gallery flood the court or palace of Octavia, and in it Capid portraied with lightning in his hand. It took up in times past as great a space, as at this day the Churches of S. Nieholas in Garcere, and S. Mary in Portica.

After the death of Martellas, Offavia his mother fet up a library near his Theatre. Now the first that ever ordained, That books of all learning should be in some publike places bestowed for so be read of all that would come ; was at Athens Pififtratus the tyrant, and at Rome Afinius Pollio.

The Cirque or hem-place Flaminius, and the Temple of Apollo.

That this Cirque Flaminius flood in that place where at this day the dark store-houses and fellars be, hard by S. Katharins church, the marks yet remaining testifie, Flaminius it was called, either because it was built about the plain called Campus Flaminius, or else by Flaminius the Cos. who was flain at the battell of the lake Thralymenus. In it were the plaies and games exhibited, which they call Apollulares: and therein the horse-runnings were performed. To it the Senat used oftentimes to come down from the Capitoll to fit in councill. Neptune also had a chappell there. Apollo's

CHAP. IIII.

The Temples of Vulcan, Mars, Bellona, Hercules, and Jupiter Stator: the column or pillar Bellica: the altar of Neptune : the gallery Corinthia : and the Coloffe of Mats.

VI Ithin the Girque Flaminim flood most famous Temples of the gods, to wit, of Vulcan, Mars, and Belone, to wit, that which was toward the gate Commentative. Belone the faid gate there food a marble pillar, which the Romans called Bellies, for it shewed when was was to be made. The Romans in old time used and retained this manner in proclaiming war: Thepub. like beadle, or one of the heralds called Facials, lanced a spear with some other enfigns of wat into that land upon which they meant to levy arms. But when after many conquests they had enlarged their empire and dominion, and that they were oftentimes to give defiance to nations far remote and diffant because they should not need to sling a spear or javelin, as I said before, into that land they did but flick one in the pillar abovenamed, on that fide which regardeth that part whither they were to make their expedition.

To Hercules the Great, protector and keeper of the cirque Flaminim, they built a Temple in the same place: for his statue was there exected in the very entrance thereof, on that side where now frandeth the Church of S. Lucy in the dark Apotheca.

M. Fulviss built another Temple of the allowance that he had of the Cenfors flock, to Herenles Musarum: for he had heard in Greece how Hercules was Musagetessi,e. the leader and companion of the Mules. The fame Fulvim translated the images of all the Mules out of the town Ambracia to Rome, and confectated them under the protection and laseguard of that melt potent and mighty deity, to the end that they might have mutuall help one of the other: namely, the quiernels of Mules by the defence of Hercules; and the valour of Hercules, by the sweet voice of the Mules. This Church much decaied and disfigured by time, Martin Philippus, Angulau histather in law, i.e. his mothers husband repaired.

In the same Cirque they would have the Temple of Jupiter Stater to stand.

There also as they gather by certain presumptions) was the altar of Neptune, which in old time Off avins reared a porch or gallery built and born up with brazen pillars, and thereupon named Corinthia. This flood between the Cirque and S. Nicholas Church, and was also called Chalcaria, i.e.brazen or copper.

The Colois of Rately of Mars, at the Cirque Flamining, was in the Temple of Brutus Callaigns, CHAP. V.

The porch or gallery of Mercury : the Theatre of Octavins : his bonfe, cloifter, and gallery: and the Temple of Venus Viereffe.

Between the Cirque Flaminius and the Tyber, in the very entry of the Church of S. Angel in Pileina, there is a porth or gallery confectated fometime to Merenry, or as fome would have it, to Juno. This being confumed with fire, L. Septimins Severns reedified. But the parch which standeth in the Jews street called Cenra, they say was builded by the Emperour Severns.

Between the gallery of Marcellus and the mount reared by Hadrian, Pompey was the first that built a Theatre to continue. For all others before were taken down when the games and shews were once done and past: and when need required, new were fet up. A great part of this Theatre when Pompey had finished, comes Caligula and made amend of the reft. Afterward, Theodorick K. of the Offragoths reedified it. This also received eighty thousand men.

Near unto this Theatrum there was a court or stately Hall, called Airium, the same which at this day they name Sacrium; also the house of Pompey & a porch before it. These edifices of Pompey at what time as Philip exhibited the stage-plaies, were confumed with fire. Near to the same theatre the emperor Claudius of famous memory, reared an arch of marble for memorial of Tiberius Cafar.

In the forefaid Theatre(men fay) was the Temple of Venus the Victoris.

CHAP. VI.

The bains Agrippina : Pantheon, and the porch thereof: also the Temple of good freed.

From the arch of Pomper, as you go northward, you shall meet with the baths Agripping the marks whereof are seen in that place which now of the inhabitants there, is called Crambella. Now, Agripping they were named of Agripps who built them: See Pliny hereof in his discountes of Nature.

Near unto the forefaid bains, there is a Temple of greatest antiquity, and among other old Temples of the city, the noblest of all the rest, which at this day remaineth in manner whole and found. Because it was dedicated almost to all the gods, they thought good to name it Pantheon. In form it was like the world, representing a sphere or globe, At this day they callit S, Maries the round, Of the temple, Pliny and others have made mention, unto whom I refer the readers. In the very porch and entry of this temple, were the statues of Augustus and Agrippa, The images of Mars and Vemus. At the lappet of Venus ear, there hung as a pendant that most costly pearl of Cleopatra. Likewise there tood the image of Minerva, the handy work of Phidias. Moreover, Herenles at whole statue the Carthaginians in old time used yearly to facrifice mankind. They ascended up to this temple as in the reft, by many fleps : for men in times pall uled to rear the temples on high and made but one way to go into them. A porch to this temple Agrippa joined :a peece of work worth all admiration, which of some was called Protheren, For this word Porticias, betokeneth nos thing elle but an ornament or porch, med vis fligues is before the dore. his right hand a charger, and in the left an ear of corn.

The baines of Nero and Alex nder: the Cirque named Agon.

Ebind S. Enflaching church, between Pantheon and Lombards-fitcet, the remusats are feen of the baines and vaults of Nero.

Neer unto these Alexander built others new(by conveighance of water into them, which they they call Alexandrina) and those very fair and delectable : Wherof Lampredius bath written much. Weer unto them (tome think) were the baths of Hadrian : and they would have them to frand in that very place where now is S. Aloifius church.

In the plain part of the City there appear most evident tokens of a long and spatious Cirques which they call at this day Agon, It took that name either of the games Agonalia instituted by K. Numa in the honour of Janus, which in that shew place are represented the 9 day of January; or because all manner of such she wes and disports, called by the Greeks Agones, were wont there to be exhibited. Some would have it to be built by Nero or Alexander, upon this reason, that other ornaments of theirs were to be shewed there. For the maner of the Princes and Emperors was ordinarily to bestow their monuments and memorials in one place,

It hapned in the temple of Ifis that incest was committed; whereupon the Emperor Tiberius caused the Priests of that temple to be crucified,& the place it felf to be demolished. The arch of Camillus: the temple of Minerva; and the Swine market.

As a man goeth down from the broad-gate aforefaid toward the Pantheon, he shall see a most ancient arch. Some think (but untruely) that erected it was for Camillar; for many a fair day after his time, these arches were in no request and use: and therefore it belonged to moother L. Generall. Between this arch and Pantheon, Cn. Pompsins built a temple to Minerva, wherein he comprised in a compendious sum, the memorial of his acts and exploits. Other enignes also in the honour of the City of Rome, he there set up, and those he garnished and adorned. Whereof read Pliny.

At the toot of the mount Quirinalis, in the hort-yards and the Columnon fer, neer to the alcent & rifing of the hil which leadeth now into the mount Caballus, there was sometime the market-place Suarium, so called of selling of twine there. For Varro witnessen, that in old time they had taken the rain set and appointed places for the selling of certain things, and thereof the markets tooke the name. Thus of oxen, the market Boarium; of fish, Pifcarium, of swine, Suarium; of wortsor herbs, Holisorium, was called, &c.

CHAP. XII.

Of the field called Martius, or Tyberinus.

Poralmuch as in the former book it hath been sufficiently declared as touching Mars field, where it lay, it shall be needlesse to make any repetition thereof in this place: but why it was called Marsius, would be here in briefe considered. Named so it was, because it was consecuted to Mars: for when the Targuins were expelled out of their Kingdom, what ground or standing corn they were possessing were expelled out of their Kingdom, what ground or standing corn they were possessing which because it was consecrated to Marsithat in it the games and plaies should be sold marsius; which because it was consecrated to Marsithat in it the games and plaies should be sold marsithat and the youth exercised, they thought that the fruit also theregowing should likewise becounted sacred and accurred, and so deemed it unlawful that any distribution whereof should be made, but threw it all into the Tybre, wherof arose the lland called Tybrina, of which we will speak in the last book. In this field therefore (besides the native beauty of the place and the delectable sight of the medows) were exceeded the ornaments and statues of brave's renowned persons; yea, and out of the very Capitoll (when the place began to be pestered and ever-stringsht by reason of sommy ornaments which thicher were daily brought, many of them were from thence translated into Campus Marsius. This field was called of men in old time, Tyberians, like as Tybre also was named Marsius.

CHAP. XIII.

The poreh, the temple, Column, and Palace of Antonius Pius: the rails or enclosure, called Ovilia.

Detween the Sciarra & Pantheon firects, neer to Saint Stephens Church in Trullio, there shewer that stately porch, which most men suppose was that of Antonius Pins, for that his temple standeth so neer. The Column allo of Antonius is not far off. This he raised of an exceeding height with winding and turning stairs, like that of Trajanus, whereof we have spoken before. Between this Column and the porch, the said Emperor had (by report) a goodly palace. Between the said Column and the water Virgo, they say, the rails or enclosure within Mars field stood, called Septa. Now this place was enclosed within woo den rails, and strongly senced with posts on overy side, wherein the people of Rome when at the creation and election of magistrats they were topale their voices were kept close and for the refemblance of sheep pens. Ovilia of some they were called. By Livy they are set to way, neer the waies Fornicasa and Flaminia.

CHAP. XIV.
The bill Citatorum: the Villa Publica, semple of Neptune, and the bridg in Mars field.

Between Anionines Colomn and S. Laurences church in Lucina, there is raifed a mount, called now Citorins, for Citarorum; not it was a mount indeed, but because the people of Rome, when in the chusing of magistrats they were to give their voices, as they were cited, went thicher as it were unto some full. Some say it was called Acceptorum, of taking the peoples suffrages: on theirs Septorum, for the vicinity of those Septo befores id. This little mount, there be that would have to rise and increase by the ruins of some porch or surely gallery; or else of the common Hostely, called Villa Publica. For there was in times past a place called Villa Publica, a large building in manner of a court or hall, wherein were received and entertained all embassadors of enemies, who might not be allowed either to enter into the City, or go into the public lodging or Hospit dealled Gracostass.

Neer to the Septa, M. Agrippa (as Denis Writeth) built a goodly temple with a most beautiful porch to it, in the honour of Nepsune.

At this forefaid hillock called Cisaserum, and the Column of Ansonius, there was a bridg fast ho by the Sept., whereupon they that were cited, when they had given their voices, passed by and went their water, and its were toward from the rest that were to give their suffrages, because they should not be entermingled amongst them, nor be able to show unto them, on whole side they had passed their voices.

In the same Mare field, it is recorded that in times past stood the temple of Piety, even whereas now the church of S. Savier is.

CHAP.XV.
The water Virgo: the lake and chappel of Inturga, as also that of Pietv.

The water Virgo, which reteineth still the pleasant sweetness to the tast in drinking, and keepeth yet the old name, beginneth to gather to an head neer the bridg Salarius i, and being carried in a most deep guter entreth into the City at the gate Collina, and so is taised to the bill Hortalorum: where, by arched work it is conveighed through Mars field, and yeelds all the way to the inhabitants, water for their use; and endeth at the length in the hortyards of Luculius.

Moreover in Mars field, there was (as men fay) a fountain and well or eithern of Inturna, fifter of K. Turnus, yeelding most holesome water. This water-Nymph, they avouch (and that right well) to have been called Inturna, a juvando, i. of helping; bocause she was thought to help the fick. The very place is at this day by a corrupt word, named Lorreglio.

CHAP. XVI.
The arch of Domitian: the obelish of Mars field i the Amphitheatre of Claudius the Emperor.

The triumphant arch, so dismembred (as it were) and bereft of all his ornaments, standing between churches of S. Sylvestre and Laurence in Lucium, and taketh up a peece of the way of street Flammia, is attributed to Domitian the Emperor. And hereupon besides others presumptions) they appropriate it to him, for this emperor reared many such arches in every place.

The Obelisk also there is in this Mans field, which Augustus transported from Hieropolis a City in Egypt to Rome. Bendes, the native ensigns and wonderfull hieroglyphick inscriptions which it brought with it of the own, therein to be seen, Augustus adjoined other ornaments no less or-mirable. But hereof it is better to read Pliny.

Clauding the Emperor built neer the Sepia in Mars field an Amphitheatre, which he decked & adorned with fair statues and most beautiful columns.

CHAP. XVII.
The vale Martia; the palace: the porch of Augustus: the Naumachie of Domitian

The vale Martia taketh the name of Campus Martius: it lyeth between Tybre and the hil Bortulorum: within the which, in a place lower then all the reft about it, appear the Naumachies of Domitian; where in old time he exhibited flows of naval fights. In which place beforestime likely it is, that Anguffus had his Naumachie; which being cleaned and feoured by Domitican, reteined afterwards his name. Read Suctonius.

and the temple of the family Flavia.

Neer to the Naumachie, was the temple (as it is thought) of the kinred Flavia. In this place, Julius Capitoliuus proveth that the porch and palace of Angustus was built.

CHAP. XVIII.

The Maufoleum of Augustus: and the two obelisks neer it: also the tomb or sepulchre of Marcellus.

IN the vale Martia, between the way Flaminia and the bank of Tybre, hard by S. Roches church, Angustus made a Mansoleum, to lerve for a fepuchre as well to himself and all the Emperors, as allo for his whole house and name. This building is like onto a turret standing at the gate called Populi, which sheweth it fell spoiled now of all the ornaments that set it out. Men would to to the spulchre of Marcellus, and Angustus, named this sepulchre of his, Mansoleum, for the resemblance it had of that of Mansoleum, to Cassing the Strabo, and other thereof.

Cloie unto the Manfoleum of Angustus, were two obelisks, as the ruinat remnants thereof do testifie.

CHAP. XIX.
The way Flaminis: the Trophes: of Matius, orher goodly ornaments of the field Martius in general.

Ness Flaminius; the collegue of M. Lepidus, having vanquished the Ligurians, paved the canley or street Flaminius. This was led from Placence, through Narnia, Fuligneum, Nacara, Callium to Fortunes temple, to Pifaurum, and so torward to Ariminum. See Livy and Successing.

Between

Between the Mansoleum of Augustus, and the hill called Hartulorum, were the Trophees of Marius overlugantha, Trophees as Varro witnesseth, were so called of eggsta Greek word, which figustion, flight; for that the manner was to hang up the spoils and distorings of enemies put to flight and flain, upon trunks and polts.

In Mars field, were the tepulchres of Sylla, Hirrins, and Panja, of Inlia. Britannicus, Drajus the Emperor Claudius, and other right hardy and valiant knights, belide infinit ornaments more, whereof we have written before in this book.

CHAP, I

Of the river Tybre.

IT (hould follow by due course and order, to treat of Lanjeulum and all that quarter of the City on the other fide of Tybre: but because these parts are separate from the rest of the City by the siver Tybre between; thereof also it is meet to say somewhat briefly. And first verily the reason of that name should be showed. Some think therefore, that the river was called Tyberis and Tile Offices, For the Sicilians when as in old time they had overcome the a Carthaginians in battel, and taken a number of them prisoners, enjoined them, for the better fortification of their own City, to call atrench about it, and to let water thereinto : and this ditch in reprosch of their enemies, they called uger. And the same men upon a time afterwards, when as they encamped near Rome, gave this very name unto sthis river fallo, whereas before it was called Albala. Some think it was named to of Tyberis a King of the Tulcans, flain upon the banks thereof. Farro is of opinion, that it took the name of Tiberius, a neighbour Prince of the Veientians. In holy writings we read it Tyberinus. In vulgar speech they call it Tyberis: in poetry, Tybris. In old time it was termed Rumon, as it were gnawing and eating the banks thereof. Also at one side of the City it was named Terentus, as a man would fay, wearing the banks. It springeth from the Apennine, above Aruns. At the first it is but imall and shallow, but before it entrethinto Rome, it (baving received 40 other rivers) is encreased to such bigness, that ships of burden and the greatest hulks, may come up in it as far as Rome. This river divideth Tuscan from Vmbria, the Sabina countrey and the Latins, entreth at the North part of the City, and so passeth through Southwards, between the gates Hoftienfis and Portuenfis, leaving Ianiculum on the right hand and the City on the left, and fo neer unto Hoftia is discharged into one mean broad stream, and falleth into the Tyrrhene les. Upon the banks thereof, as if they were confecrate to some divine power, it was not lawfull to fet up any building. Certain warders and keepers there were appointed, for the chanell and the banks, But of this river, Pliny and others have left much in writing.

CHAP. II. Of the bridges built upon Tybre.

The Types, as is abovefaid, being so deep as that it is navigable, and heareth the greatest ships, hath no soord in any place that can be waded through; and therefore necessary it was soon make bridges over it, and so to join that part on the fatther side of Types, to the rest of the City. He enter, after he had killed Geryon, built a bridg, where afterwards stood that which they called Subticius. Also before the foundation of the City, there was a bridg over Types, called Sacer, upon which they factificed men to Saurar by throwing them down into the tiver. But when Hereises afterwards had put down that maner of sacrificing, he gave order, that mens images made of reeds and bultushes (which they called Argess) should be esst down in stead of them. But after the City was built, there were other bridges made to the number of eight; to wit, Milvius, Elius, Vasicanus, Ianiculensis, Cessius, Fabricius, Palatinus, and Subsicius. And all these, save the subsicius only, Vesilas overthrew.

CHAP. III. The bridge Milvins.

The bridg Milvins, which men now call Molvins, flandeth upon the way Flaminia, a mile and more from the City. Built it was in the troublefome times of Spla, by Scanns when he was Cenfor, Many a time they fay it was cast down, and as often fet up again.

The bridg Elius, now S. Angel, the Vaticas or Triumphal the Ianiculentis or Anrelianus.

The bridg at this day called S. Angel, in times past Elins, took that name of Alins Hadrinanian, among the built that brdg, and neer unto it a sepalchre, which they call Moles Hadrinanian.

Beneath

The Topographie of Rome.

Beneath this is another which giveth paffage into the mount Vatican and the plain thereof, and thereupon they named it Vaticans; allo Triamphalia for that over it they went up in triumphto he Capitol, to eive thanks to Impire and rejoice. The piles are yet to be feen in Tyber, overagaint the foittle or the Capitoll of S. Spirit. The third bare the name Lancalanise of Indiana meet unto it, and Aurelianus of the port-way Aurelia, or the gate to called. Anconing Pins paved it over with marble, and being demolified in the civil wars, just called the broken bridg. Afterwards Pope Xyfus' the fourth recedified it, and gave unto it his own name.

CHAP. V' The brigdes Fabricius and Cellius.

Beneath the bridg Awelius one furlong, over-against the Theatre of Marcellus, in the very midst of the channell of Tyber, there appeareth a shelf or Island, this was moited to the City by the bridg Tarpeius, to called sixt of the rock Tarpeianeer unto it, afterwards, Fabricius, of L. Fabricius, who by that bridg conjoined the City and Island together. The same at this day is called the bridg of four heads, taking the name of four marble images with four faces apeece, standing at the entry of tig bridg, but that bridg which cloteth the laid. Island with the part within Tyber, was called Esquilinus or Cestius in times past, but now S. Barthalmens bridg.

CHAP. VI. Of the Island Tiberina.

F. this Islands beginning, we have treated before in the description of Mars field. Livy and Diomyfiss also set down this story at largh. It resembles to the form of a bireme gally, and where it is broadelly, it is not above a dark shoot over, in length it containeth about two stadies or a quarter of a mile. This was in times past called Lycannia, and was hallowed to the honour of Escalapins, whose image from out of Epidamns; was thit her brought. Of Escalapins and his temple read Plan.

A temple also of Jupiter standeth in it dedicated by C, Servilius the Daumvir, which had been yowed by L. Furius sixyeers before the Gauls war.

In the same Island were sick tolk presented unto Assembly (in the field.) And neer unto the temple of the said god, was a lazar-house, for that this god was the inventer and maintainer of Physick.

In it also flood the chappell of Faunus, neer to the very river: burgicarcely remain there any tokens there. This Faunus (as men lay) was reported to have been the first that confecrated chappels and temples to the gods, and for this caule, all such places confecrated to the gods were called Faun By the testimony of Cornelius Tacisus and Succonius the statue of the emperor Insing stood there.

CHAP, VII,

The Senators bridg called also Palatine, and that which is named Sublicius.

Beneath the abovenamed Island, as it were a darts cast off, was the seventh bridg, Senatornus pons, of the Senators, also Palatinus, of the mount Palatine neer adjoining: and at this day named it is the bridg of S. Mary in Egypt, by teason of S. Maries churchneer by.

Now followeth the laft bridg Subleins, and which also is counted the most ancient of all or thers. This was fift made of timber by Aneus Martins at the very foot of the Aventine mount. I framed only with a floor of planks without any iron spikes and nails or props to shoat against it, to as in times of war and trouble it might be taken in pecces one from another. Now Subleins it was called a Sublicia, i. great strong posts, But afterwards Amplius Lepidus made it of stone, and thereupon named the matble bridg Upon it in old time sat beggers craving of alms of the passens. From it also leud and wicked maletactors, were thrown down headlong into Tiber. This brigd as well as other, was often demolished and built up again by one or other.

Ofithat side of the City which is beyond Tyber. The City and temple of the Ravenats and Fors Forettina: the baths of Severus: the hort-yards of Calasthe water Alfietina, & the medows of Mutius

He region beyond Tyber in old time had the name of Inniculum, the hill which overlooketh and commandeth the greatest part thereof. We find it also called of men in those daies the City of the Ravenares, who with a steet having aided the Romans, were permitted to dwell in the Inniculum, for fear left at any time that mountain and hold should be seized and kept by the enemies. Now for as much as this quarter was enhabited by base people, such as followed vile occupations, there were in it but sew things worthy of any remembrance. Severus therein buile certain bairss: Casar made hort-yards and prepared also a fair pool called the Naumachie for shiplight there. Also the temple of Fars fortuna, was (in Tib Casars daies) dedicated in that quarter

All this place thus enclosed, he called the Cirque, Alfo the pools made for ship-fight, called Naumachia were there, and the Obelisk of Cafar in the way Triumphalis is yet to be feen standing upright. CHAP. XI.

The way or firees Triumphalis, the water Sabbatina, the fepulchre of Scipio.

F the Triumphall way, there hath been some mention made before. Called so it was, for that Othe folemn pomp of triumph used to go that way up into the Capitol. This as well as others was paved with flint (tone, It went on ftill to the back porch of S, Celfus, towards the plain field of Flora: and fo forward to the temple tometime of Jano, now S. Angelo, and from thence to S. Georges church in Velabram. In the pontifical hort-yards there be many antiquities found, brought thither from other places: and namely, the protraiture and counterfet of Nilus, also of al forts of creatures living and encreasing there. Likewise of Tiber, with the yeelding her teats to be sucked of the founders of Rome. Apollo with his bow and arrows ; the statue of Laocoon, whereof hath been spoken before, Cupid hard by Venus. Many other things before appear in the gallery, and those hort-yards.

The water Subbatina, was derived to Rome from the Sabbatine pool, called Ang nillaria: and afterwards when the conduct and conveighance thereof was by Hadrian restored, it was brought into the palace of S. Peter, to ferve the priefts there.

In Vaticane plain, not far from the mount reared by Hadrian, there flood a Pyramis or fleeple in times palt, under which they fay P. Scipio Africanus lay enterred.

A Elius Hadrianus reared a huge and mighty mount for his own sepulchre neer the bridg Elius, oversgainst the Manfoleum of Angustus. In which were bestowed first his own ashes, and asterwards the relicks of all the Amenes. This is at this day the fort of the Popes. The same also is called the tower of Crefeenius, beganic one Crefeenius, atactious captain, held it a long time. See more in Procepins.

The meddows Quincia in the plain Vaticanus, took the name of Quintins Cincinnains, Read Phiny hereof. Now they be called Aprata.

CHAP. XIII.

Of shole things which either have been, or remain now mithout the gate Flumentana.

"He first thing presented to our fight when we are out of the gate Flumentana is the port-way or causey Flaminia: which, as we have before shewed, was by Cn. Plaminia brought along as far as Ariminum. Within the City he paved it with flint or peble : without he laid it with gtavell. And in that order be all the port-waies laid about Rome. Upon this way Augustus made four bridges, whereof at this day there remain learcely any tokens. Neer unto the cauley Cafar had a farm or manor house, which he called ad Gallinas. The reason of that name Live shewarb. To the way Flaminia, another named Claudia joined upon which were the Hort-yards of Ovid.

The way Emplea, made and paved by Lepidus the colleague of Flaminius, leadeth from Ariminum as far as Bononia. Now, two causeies there were of that name, the one which met with Fla. minia: the other which Scanrus laid and made, which went through P.fe and Luna to the Sabatii. In likemaner there was a way called Tyberina and Caffia, without the gate now called Viridaria. which palled along time by Sutrium, Tetrella, and Viterlium into the way Vulfine nis.

Certain places there be in the way Flammia tomewhat hollow and flat like laddles, called therfore Clitella.

Without the gate Collatina there is a cauley of the same name.

The things that either were, or at this day are without the gates Numentana and Intraggeres.

It hout the gate Numentana, there beginneth a causey of the same name, by which med go to Numentana. The same is called Finalensis of the name of the goddeffe Nania, which was wont to wait & attend upon funerals with dolefull plaints and lamontable mones, is reported to have had a temple without this gate. In like maner, other gods and goddefles, which are supposed to hurt mankind, they erected temples, but without the gate, because they should do the lesse harm and namely, to the Fever, to Mars the revenger, to Nemelis and such other. Upon this way Numentana there appeareth a most ancient temple of Bacchus about fortune and S. Agnes church, and over the same standeth the bridg Numentanus, built by one Narfetes an Euffort. nuch. Between this way and Salaria, was a withdrawing house in the countrey of Phanotus Neros freedman, in which Nero killed himfelf. Without the gate Interaggeres, was a tower or cafile called Cuftedia, where the fouldiers of Dioclefian kept a corps de guard. There also is a park called Vivarrium (now Vivariolum) to be feen, where divers wild bealts were kept, more for pleafure and delight, then profit and ule.

were the nort-yards or Galoa the Empeter; and the celebrated at Rome, namely, to the goddesse of At the gute Fontinalis, was the fealt Fontinalia celebrated at Rome, namely, to the goddesse of Fountains, as faith Sext, Pompeins.

To the Reader.

Or as much as Titus Livius is prolix and full of variety: and how for ever other wife willing enough to feed, our language, yet most look to for bear and forget certain Roman words who with fo long time he had been acquainted adjo for that now & then he faith one in his English tengal and in his French and Italian another; whereby he may be thought either to trip for to have for gotten himself, and the fault imputed to his teacher: in these regards (me thought). I swed this much for their sake and converse with English Livy, as to latisfie them in that behalf. A twoshed in the therfore I have digested: the one directing and leading readily to the most material and principal matters contained in the whole body of the History: the other expounding these things that may feem at first firange to the most: and with all, she wing here and there the reason of the forestanding greement, hoping that at use will make them more familiar in those strong prases: so deeper and far greement, but him in the primitive Latine (the only tookshow of his two speech) shall except and acquit me of just blame, who have endeavoured that he might deliver his mind in English, if not so elequently by many degreet, yet as truly, as in Latine.

A Second Index,

Containing the exposition of these terms in Livy which are not yet familiar in English, and of some places omitted in the Marginal notes.

Whereunto the Reader may have recourse, when he meeteth with any such difficulty in the History.

alas, the furname to divers families in Ædils, certain inferior magistrats in Reme: who were of two forts; Plebeis and Curules, Plebesi, of the Commons only, two in number more ancient then the other, choice by the people alone to fecond and to assist the Tribunes of the Commons as their right hands. This name they took of the charge they had of temples, chappels, and oratories : albeit they registered the San-Ctions and acts of the people called Plebifeita and kept the fame in their own cultody; and were clarks of the market: also they exhibited the games and plaies called Plebeit. Cavales, were likewife twain elected out of the order and degree of the Patrissi: lo called of the ivory chair wherin they were allowed to fit, as officers of greater ftate. They fet forth the great folemnities called Lads magni, or Remani; were overleers of the buildings throughout the City as well publick as privat, in manner of the asomoroi in Athens; they had regard to the Publick vaults, finks, conveiances, and conduits of the City waters; looked to the Arienal,&c. Moreover, they had power to attach the bodies of great persons; and were charged to see unto the provision of corn and victuals. At the first, none but Parritii might be advanced to this place: but in process of time, Commoners also attained thereunto. These as well as the Plebeis were Sacrofantti, i unviolable.

Erarii, they were, who being citizens of Rome. were by the Cenfors deprived of giving their voices in their Century or Tribe; paid all tribute with citizens according to the valuation of their goods; and served in the wars of their own charges: and either because ara pendebant, or, ara non merebant, it feemeth they took that name.

'Agmen quadratum : Agmine quadrate ducere, is taken in a three-fold sence. First, The same that infesto exercitu, infesto agmine, or, inf stis fignis: which fignifieth the ordinary manner of enemies marching with banners displaied, either to a battail, or to the fiege and affault of a fort : and this manner of phrase addeth a grace only to the fentence. Secondly, To march or fight in a four square battaillon, shough not alwaies with equal fides & right angles: and the same nor charged with the carriages at all. Thirdly, When an army is spread and displaied at large, enclosing the impediment or baggage in the mids, for fafety and fecurity.

Α

Agraria, were laws preferred by the Tribuns of the Commons, as well for division of lands (conquered from the enemies) among the Commons; as to restrain the possessions of the Nobies within a certain limit and compaís.

Ambieus, The inordinat and excessive defire to be in office of flate, appearing by indirect and unlawfull means; either to their friends and kinsfolks, or to the people : againstwhich, many laws in Rome were provided; namely, Acilia, Babia, Emylia, Licinia, and others.

Ancilia: Ancile was a buckler or scutcheon, that (as they fay) fell from heaven into the hands of K. Numa in time of a plague: and he being advertised by Egeria, That it was for the health of the City, and ought to be kept fafe; caused 11 more to be made unto it, so like, as they could not be known from the pattern: which hereby was preserved. The keeping hereof was committed to the twelve

Annales, were brief memorials, Chronicles, or commentaries, containing the names of confuls every year, the date of times, and all memorable occurrents hapning therein. The high Priests, called Pontifices maximi, had the charge by their place to gather the same into tables, and to fet them up in their houses for to be feen: and hereupon they were called Annales maximi à Maximis Pontificibus; and not of their greatness, as those huge volumes, named Libri Elephantini. App. Appius, a forename appropriate to the House of the Claudii in Rome. Appia via, A notable freet or high-way; begun by Ap. Claudius, reaching from Rome, as far as Capsa: and afterwards by Julius Cafar and Trajan, it was extended to Brindis in Calabria. Of all other it seemeth to be the principal, by the testimony of Papinius the Poet, who writeth thus of it:

Appia constarum fertur Regina viarum. Called it was Triumphalis (as also the gate Capena;) because through it the triumphs ordinarily passed at the said gate.

Ara maxima, The great alter reared by Herenles, and took the name of a great heap of stones about it.

Arbon

Arbor infalix, Is commonly taken for a tree that naturally beareth no fruit.

Argiletus imus, Is the base or low part of a fireet in Rome; in regard of the upper end thereof, called Summus: in like fort as Janus

Summus & imus.

Area, is taken for some void place, whereupon nothing groweth, quia aret:as Forum boarium in Rome. Area qua posito de bove nomen habet, and differeth from Campus, for that it is less. Alio a plot of ground made levell and clean for to build upon : as in Snetonius 26. Forum Cafar de manubiis inchoavit, the Area wherof, (ideft, the trimming and levelling of the plot) coft H-S. millies, tdeft, 100 millions of Sestertii. Last of all the broad yards before temples, not covered but compassed about with columns, like a cloister with an alear in the mids, be called Area.

Arufpices, were wifards or fouth-fayers, directed by the bowels and inwards of beafts killed for facrifice, called also Extispices, and in Greek is eo one woi, who prying into them, had especial regard of the liver; whereupon their whole Art and learning was termed intertoσκοπία, albeit they observed also the heart, lungs, spleen, and kidnies.

As, or Assis, usually in Livy is taken for a Roman poife, or coin in brass, the tenth part in value of their filver Denarius. At first it was a pound weight of twelve ounces; but afterwards, the Sextans, id eft, the fixt part therof, was valued worth the whole: and howfoever otherwise it altered in poise, it went alwaies for 3 farthings or thereabout of our english money.

Augurium, See Auspicia,

Aurei Romani, Pecces of gold coin currant in Rome: in round reckoning equivalent to our spur-roial of 15 sh. For 100 Sestertii made aureum, which amount to 15 sh. 7 d. ob. the 4 part of mina, i. a lib. in filver, and of an ounce of angel gold.

Auspicia: Auspices were properly the observation on of the birds, either by their finging and flying in the air; or by their gef u e and manner of feeding in their caves or coup : whereby their Augurs & Pullarii knew in their learning, the pleasure and will of the gods, whether they favoured their enterprises or no. The birds that gave fign by their voice and finging, they called Ofsines quasi ore canentes, as the crow, raven, and owl; and therof came Augurium, quasi avium garritus. Those that shewed ought by their flight & wings, were named Alites or Prapetes, as the buzzard, eagle, crane, grype, swan, and broad-winged fouls. παινη είνουρες. The good signs were called Sinistra auspicia quasi sinistima, quod sinant feri. whether they came from the left hand or the right. In pullets or chickens kept in cages, they observed whether they came forth willingly to their meat (for to abstain from it was thought unlucky) whereas their feeding heartily, was a good fign, and called solistimum tripudium, quas terripavium & terrapudium, when some of the meat falleth out of the mouth, & serram pavit, i, beateth upon the ground ; as it must needs do, when they pecked either corn, or gobbets called off a.

Alifts, were certain wars-like engins for to Send out and level mighty stones, to batter and shake City wals, made with ropes offinews and womens hair especially twined together: as appeareth, by Venus Calva at Rome, unto whom, by occasion that the women of the City parted with their hair for that purpose, a Temple was dedicated. According to the weight of stones or bullets that this engin would carry, they were called Centenaria. os Talentaria balifta.

Bafilies, were stately edifices or halls at Rome; at first serving to plead in under covert, wherin they differed from Fora: and also to minifter justice, of Barinede, which fignifieth : Judge, as well as a King : but afterwards they used to meet there in consultation; also to negotiate and traffique: and these had not only benches and bars like law-courts, but shops also for the better fort of wares and merchandise.

Bellona, The goddels of war; whole temple stood before the gate Carmentalu, and neer adjoining thereunto was a column named Bellica: from which the Romans were wont to lance a dart or javelin towards those parts where they intended to make war : whereas in former times they sent their heralds to the very confines of their enemies, to perform that ceremony.

Bigati, were the Roman Denarii, having the stamp of a chariot drawn with two horses,

Baotarche, The chief magistrats of the Boo-

C. Caius. The forenames of fundry fa-milies in Rome.

Calends, was among the Romans, the day of thenew Moon, which fell out with them ordinarily the first of every month : so named Sao rov naserv, id eft, a calando, because the petty Pontify used then to call the people to the court Calabra, and there to pronounce unto them how many daies were to the Nones of each month, &c.

Candidati, were they that flood in election and fued for dignities of magistracy: during which time, they wore whiter and brighter gowns than ordinary, that they might be the more easily seen and discerned a far off among

Cataphracti, as well horse as foot, were they that were armed at al peeces with compleat harness : and such horsmen were named Defenfores. Catapults, were engine of war to shoot arrows or such like offensive weapons, far off: and by that name was called not only the instrument it felf, but the arrow or whatfoever was shor out of it : as Turneb. writeth in his 15 Adversar.cap.1.

Cenfors, Magistrats of State in Rome: whose charge was to value and estimate mens goods, and enrol them accordingly in their feveral ranges. Also to demise unto certain Farmers, called Publicans, the publick profits of the City for a rent, and to put forth the City works unto them, to be undertaken at a price. Likewise to oversee mens manners, whereby oftentimes they would deprive Senators of their dignity, take from gentlemen their horses of service and their rings; displace Commoners out of their own tribe, disable them for giving voices, and make them Erarii.

Centuries, were ranges and degrees of men according to their worth, as they were affested and enrolled by the Cenfors.

Centuriata comitia, were those assemblies and elections, wherein the people of Rome gave their voices and fuffrages according to their behaviour & wealth, by Centuries, And such were at all times most favourable to the no-

Circenfes ludi (as one would fay) Circu-enfes. For in the beginning before the great lifts and shew-places (called Cirques) were built, the plot of ground wherein were performed the horie-runnings and other masteries, was flanked of the one fide with the river, and environed on the other with fwords. Vide Tur-

neb. Adversar, Ub.3, cap.5.

Ciftophorus, A peece of filver coin in Greece and those parts neer adjoyning, less than Drachma or Denarius : so called of the stamp, representing a man carrying a panier or casket with boly reliques, in Cybeles mysteriis, in Bacchi orgiis, or Cereris imitis. If it be true, that 7500 of them go to the Enboick salent, which containeth 4000 Denarii, it is just our groat sterling: but if Denarius have proportionem sesquiquartam to it, and that 4 Denaris are 5 cistophors, (as Glavean collecteth out of Budens) it cometh to our teston of 6 pence.

Cleacina, supposed to be the image of Venus, found by K. Tating in the great vault or fink conveighed under the city, called Cloaca maxima. And for that it was not known what goddess it resembled, he gave it the name of that place. Others fay, it is written Cluacina, of the old word Clue (to fight:) for that the Romans and Sabins (ready to firike a battail) were by means of myrtle branches confecrated unto Venus, pacified and reconciled, in that very place where afterwards the faid goddels was by that name worthipped.

Coemptionalis fener, Paulus Manutius upon the familiar Epiftles of Cicero, giveth this attribute to Scapius in the end of the third book of Livy, whereas in all editions it is, Concisnalis. Now the fe Coemptionales fenes (faith he) were those old men, in whose tuition and authority, men by their last will and testament left their widows or daughters; and without whom they might not pais in Dominium virorum per coemptionem, i. be married according to the ceremony called Coemption, whereby the husband and wife feemed to buy one another.

Cobort, was ordinarily a band of 500 fouldiers; although once or twice in Livy we read of

Comitium, was a publick place or Hall within the Forum Romanum, where the people used to affemble for audience of justice, pleading of causes, and other occasions: whereupon Comitiales dies, were such daies upon the which they might so assemble and meet together.

Comitia, or Comices, were the folemn affemblies of the people at Rome, fummoned by the magiftrats lawfully; to choose officers, to enact new laws or cancel old, by their voices: wher-of were three forts.

Curiata, instituted by Romalus. Centuriata, by S. Tullius. Tributa, brought in by the Tribuns of the people: and the first author thereof W28 P. Voliro.

Curiata and Centuriata, were Auspicata,i. petformed with the folemnity of observing the approbation of the birds, and the Senators.

Tributa, were held by the Commons only penes guos non erant auspicia, and required neither Auspicia nor authoritatem, i, the allowance of the Patres. And as in Comities Centuriatie, the richer and greater men had the vantage lo in Curiata and Tributa, the poorer fort (for their number) went away with the better.

In the Cureata comitia, at the first (until S. Tulliss his reign) passed the election of KK, and other magistrats, judgements in capital matters, and laws, But in later times, they ferved only for two laws: i, de imperio, or, de re militarium; in which the conful or others (chosen to their magistracy in Centuriatis comitis) had authority of command in the army: the other, de adoptione; and these laws were called Cariata. In the Centuriata comitia, from the time of Ser.

Tullins, passed the elections of consult, Decemvirs, Tribuns confular, Cenfors, Pretors, and fuch greater magiftrats; and confirmed they were by Curiaia. Also, judgment of capital matters, &the laws named Centuriate. In this, there was one centurie drawn forth by lot out of all the rest, to give their voices first, and that was called Prarogativa. After which were called to their fuffrages, the Centuries of the first and second Classis, and they were named Prime-vocata: the rest which followed, were called Inre-vecata.

Tributa, served for the creation of Tribuns, AEdiles of the Commons, and other inferior magistrats. Also the laws as touching peace, or enfranchifing allies, judgments penal and fines, and those ordinances concerning the good of the Commons, called Plebifcita.

Some have thought amils, and Curiata and Tributa comitia, were both one: but Curiata were more ancient, and of greater state as Ecece 2 being Auspicara, and ex authoritate Patrum. Herein only they agreed together and differed from the Cemureata, that in delivering their voices, the Tribes and Curiæ were intermingled: wheras the Centuries were forted and gave their voice according to their degree, age, and ability in the Centors book.

Congius, or Chus, A measure among the Romans containing 6 Sentarii, and every Sentarius about 20 ounces s fo that Congins receiveth X. librales menfuras; as appeareth by the old pourtraiet thereof in brais, with these two Characters, X.P. i, ten pound. Whereby in round reckoning it may go for our wine gal-Ion or somewhat better. And for that great persons were wont at first to give dole unto the common people, of wine or oil by the Congii; all other donatives and largesses of that kind, were alterwards called Congiaria. Conful, one of the loveraign yeerly magistrats in Rome, succeeding in the place of KK. so named. a Confulendo either of asking counsel of the people and Senate in State matters, and withal giving his own advice and providing for the good of the weal-publick : or elfe of judging, for lo Confulere fignifieth; as when we fay, boni confulere. And Livy faith, that Preseres, Confules, and Judices, may be taken one for another. Two of them were usually chosen every year as appeareth by the law of the 12 Tables : Regio imperio duo sunto : isque preaundo. Judicando Consulendo, Pratores, Ju-dices, Confules, appellantor, &c. Corona, hath divers fignifications in Livy. Corona wrbem eingere,i. to invest a City round about with armed men, and to give the affault from all parts at onec. Sub corona vendere forvos,i. to fell flaves in open market, either having garlands on their heads as the manner was; or environed about with a guard of fouldiers, which also is called Corona milium. Sundry garlands or chaplets there were moreover called Corona, wherwith fouldiers were rewarded by their captains, or they honored by their fouldiers; (befides those that were presented to Generals by their friends and well-willers, or offered to the honour of the gods:) as Obsidionalis or Gramines. which was a wreath of a cuich grass called Gramen, given to him that delivered an army from streight sieges, and was by the whole army bestowed upon that favior. Civica, made of oke branches, for him that in battel faved the life of his fellow citizen. Maralis, resembled the battlements of walls; which he received of his captain, that first scaled the walls and mounted over in the affault of cities. Caftrenfis, in form of a pallaisade or rampier made with pales or firong fakes: the honor of him who first entred the enemies camp. Navalis or Roferara, pourtraied with the stems or beak-heads of ships, called Rosera; his reward that first boorded the enemies ship, and gave the first means of a naval victory: These were the principal. For, others there were not fo ordinary, as namely, Exploratorea garnished and fer out with the fun, moon, and other

ftars; bestowed upon them that did special fervice in espial and discovery of the enemies

Cursa, were parishes in Rome, 30 in number inflituted by Romulus. Pulones, were certain Priests whose office was to prepare and fet out the folemn feaft for Jupiter called Epulum, and for other gods. Of them were three, called Triumviri Epulones, and after feven, Septemviri Epulones.

Eciales were the Heralds : of whom there was a colledge of 20, the principal of them was Paterpatrates as it were their Dean. And according to Plutarch, he ought to be a man that had children of his own, and his father living: for having the charge of making peace and alliances, it behoved that he should be a person accomplished, and as well to look betore as behind aux σεδουν κό δπίσω, to regard what is palt and what is to come: the one was fignified by his father, the other by his children.

Fast signifieth sometimes festos dies.i. holidaies: and in that sence Ovidentituleth his books Fasti, wherein he setteth down the ordinary feasts of every month, Otherwhiles they are put for law-daies, wherin the L. chief justice or Pretor might use these three words, Do, Dico, Addico, which betoken to give leave to the party for to plead, to minister law and juffice between plantif and defendant, and to pronounce the fentence and award.

Flamines, certain Priests among the Romans: they took that name of Filamen, a filet of wollen yarn, that they used to wear upon their heads. Three of them there were Patririi, and those were called Majores, namely, Dialis, for the service of Jupiter. 2 Martialu, of Mars. 3 Quirinalis, of Romulus deified. Of Commoners were 12 more, called Minores, deputed to inferior charges, and the meanest of them all attended the service of Pomona the goddess of apples and such fruits.

Forum Romanum, or Latium, The great common place at Rome, wherein causes were pleaded, and audience given to publick Orations. Under the name of Forum were other places alfo and courts as alfo markets diffinguished by their proper adjuncts, as Forum Boarium, Olitorium, &cc.

Furca, Whereof flaves were called Furciferi, was a kind of fork or gibbet which flaves carried upon their shoulders when they were scourged by their masters, either about the Forum or Cirque: whereupon afterwards they were crucified and executed: howbeit, fome think they bare it only for a publick

GAbin's cinttus was a kind of habit and wearing of a gown after the Gabines fashion, when it was cast over the shoulder so backward, that it feemed to compass and gird round the whole body. In that manner the Conful clad, used solemnly to set open the dores of Ianua Temple, before he went to the wars.

Genius] Genii were supposed to be uswir as and pararis, brokers (as it were) between men & the gods, or rather interpreters and Salutigeruli messengers between, of a middle nature betwixt the one and the other, Calius Rhodigin, lib.2.chap.3. But according to Empedocles, each one was thought to have his angel from the very day of nativity, unto whom they used to sacrifice upon their birth day, as to their protector. Also every place had their peculiar Genis, and then were they called Lares, as Rurales, and permarini in Livy.

Galli, Priests of Cybele that guelded themselves in a frantike fory, and used in their service to her, for to strike and beat upon tabers and drums.

Н

Hasta, Besides the ordinary signification, significant the Centumviral or Decemvirrall jurisdiction in supply or assistance of the Prztorian, for that they fet up a spear to be feen at the place of judgement. Also it betokeneth port-fale, when they fold either goods or flaves to him that would bid most at fuch a spear. Moreover, the putting forth of the Cities works, called * Wiro tributa, to certain Publicans or undertakers by the great, at a price, and it was called Subha-Statio.

Eccec 3 .

I Ann is a God in Rome, cometime represented Bifrons with two faces, fignifying the time passed, and that to come: otherwhiles Quadrifrons, & betokeneth the sour times of the year: having in his right hand a character resembling 300, in the lest another, shewing threes core and five, according to the daies of the year. Bur in the plural number Ians, betoken certain hals or great foursquare buildings, with sour prospects and cross thorowfares, whereof were divers in Rome.

Ides, Eight daies in every month of an old word Ideo, to divide: for that they commonly fall about the midft of the month, namely, upon the thirteenth or fitteenth daies, according to Horace, Idus the furn agenda, qui dies mensem Veneris marina, findis aprelem.

Interdiffed of water and fire, were they who for some crime were banished. Which judgement, although it was not by express fentence pronounced, yet by giving order, that no man should receive such an one into his house, but deny him fire and water (the two necessary elements of life) he was condemned as it were to a civil death: and this was called Legitimum existum. But voluntary existe was, when a man to avoid the payment of a grievous sine, or imprisonment, went out of the way of his own accord, and left his native countrey.

Ingerum, which commonly-I translate Acre, seemeth among the Romans, to be in measuring of land the Basis, ground, and soundation of all other measures in that kind; like as, the Als or Affis, of weights: of which it borroweth the terms in sub-division and multiplication, whereof the least is Semiforupulum. Now is the Scrupulum in land measure fifteen foot square, according to which, it may foon be gathered, how much Ingerum containeth, confidering it hath that name, a drobus attibue junttis: by which reckoning it beareth 28800 foot of ground within the fquare. But for that, others think that Iugerum is almuch as uno jugo boum uno die exarari posest, i one daies work of a yoke or teem of oxen: for want of another fitter word (except I would call it a journel) I have expresfed it by our familiar term of an acre, which is not much under or over a daies work in plowing of oxen here in England.

Interregnum, or Interregency, is properly the time between the former King deceased, and the creation of a new: and he that ruled in the mean space, was called Interrex. Which terms continued afterwards in the sree state when there were no Kings, in the case of vacancy of head-magistrats.

H-S. This Character compounded of two capital II, and the letter S. thus coupled together, is Sessenius, that is to say, a silver coin among the Romans, constiting of two Assand an half, and thereupon it hath the name Sessenius as a man would say, Semis terting.

two, and half the third: and therefore you fee the numeral note of two, and S. for femis, which is half. It is the fourth part of the Roman Denarise, and in value among us is three half pence farthing cue. But Seftertium in the neuter gender, betokeneth almuch as mille Seftertios, i. a thousand Sefterces, fo that decem Seftertia fignifieth ten thousand Seferting and decem Seftertoum is as much for you must in this maner of speech understand millia for the regimen of the Genitive case, But if you add unto Seftertium the numeral adverbit sheweth the same Seftertium in the neuter abovefaid, multiplied a hundred times fo much as the faid numeral beareth. For example, decies Seftertium, is decem Sestertium, a hundred times told, and as much to fay as decies centena millia Se stertium, which is a million of Sesterces in the primitive signification: whereby a man may foon reckon how much is millies Seftertium and the reft either under or over decies. The same is to be said of Numus and Numum, for it is the same that Seftertius and Seftertium, Moreover, decies, millies, and fuch like adverbs, whether you put Numum or Sestertium thereto, or no, is all one: fo that by this form of speaking, ejus bona frerunt vicies, is meant thus, his goods amounted unto two millions of Sefterce peeces. Thus much for Livy and other Historians and writers in profe: for I am not ignorant that Poets for the verselake confound these two words many times, and put Seftertii for Seftertia, as Georgius Agricola hath well observed.

Inpiter Indiges, Indigetes were these called, any guid and lime reit indigeant, because they need nothing, or guass in deir agentes; i, converting among the Gods, having been sometimes men; or by reason that they might not indigestari, i, be named; or rather for that they were easy to be entreated and last of all, guaranties in loco degentes & ideo propiiti, i, the tutelar gods and protectors of this or that place which I rather encline unto.

Institum, was the stay of civil juridiction and pleas for the time, upon some suddain troubles, as Tunnitus Gallicus. &c., Which wacation, if we will be somewhat bold, may be called not unfitly a Lawsteed, as Saffitium the Sun-steed.

Lettifern, is in fome fort declared in the fift and two and twenty books of T. Livins, and is as much to fay, as the folemn ceremony of trimming and fetting out a bed, por for repole but repafsaccording to the ancient maner: wherein they laid the images of their gods, reared upon bolfters and pillows: the principal whereof was that in the honour of Jupiter at the Epulum Jovis, wherupon Jupiter was laid, Juno and Mineron fitting of eights of the pulm.

ther fide by him. Lettus is usually to be understood in Livy for the bed whereupon they laid themselves at ease when they took their refection, and Triclinium is taken for Conclave, i. the parlor where they were wont to iup, because the usual manner was to set three such beds or pallets together: (whereof the room had the name)and a table raised somwhat higher from the floor, and placed so, as it served all three pallets, and was open at one fide for the servitors to come unto it, and either set meat thereupon, or to minister what was called for. Upon each of these beds there sate or leaned ordinarily three persons: so as nine was the full number of guests at the boord, according to the rule, No fewer than the graces, nor more than the mules, For Horace in this verse, Sape tribus lectis videas conare quaternos, feemeth to glance at the niggardife of that would rather want meat than guests, and so set twelve at the table which was but for nine, whereby also they were pent up together too freight.

Legati, are usually taken for Embassadors sent from one Prince or Stateto another. Also for Lieutenants in an army, having the charg of a legion under the General; and in his absence, the charge and command of all. Who likewise were sent as Nuntioes or messengers of credence from the Generals in the field, to make true report unto the Senat, of the success of their affairs. Moreover, they are oftentimes put for deputed-delegats, or commissioners affishant to the Cos. or L. General, in matters of state: having their principal directions from the Senat, but commission to deal in the particulars after their own discretion: much like to those that be called Libitina, the goddels of funerals; and after a fort, the fuperintendent over fepultures; fupposed to be Venua Epitymbia. In whose Temple were all things to be sold necessary for the interring and burial of the dead. Whereupon they also who were employed to carry forth and bury corpies, were called Libitinarii as well as Vestillones; in Greek wheepoest and renegodes fue. It is put for death in Horace, when he saith, Non omnia moriar, magnaque pars mei, Vitabit Libitinams and in Livy, as well for the ministers as surniture to sepultures belonging. The Chappel to this goddess flood without the City, and a gate there was Livitinensis, at which they carried forth their dead. For at Rome they might not commonly bury or burn a dead corps within the City unless it were upon a special priviledge and the law of 12 tables provided therfore in these express words. In urbe non lepelito neve urno: but in some barren part of their land, each man bestowed the ashes or bodies of their dead. The practice whereof is evident by many examples inhistories; and at this day are monuments standing of their tombs reared neer the great causey Appia, and elfewhere about Rome. The confideration hereof, with some other circumstances of a place in the 3 book of Livy, gave me occasion haply to translate amils. There hapned to be a great mortality in Rome and the territory about it, not only of men but of cattel alfo; at what time as the Volicians and Aquians were encamped within three miles of Rome, with a purpose to give the affault to the City; but they were suddainly striken with a fear that they durit not approach neer teltaque procul visa atque imminentes tumuli avertere mentem corum, &c. where I have englished imminentes tumuli, tombs & graves neer at hand, in opposition of tella urbis Romana proculvifa: and the rather, becaule it presently followeth, In deferto agro, inter tabem perorum atque hominum: where tumuli, may wel be put for tombs and monuments; and [imminentes] neer at hand: as Livy and others do take those words. But if any man would have it meant rather of the 7 hills of Rome commanding and overlooking those houses aforesaid, I will not be against it, but rather my Jeuréeau φροντίδες Thall go with him : and pardon me I hope he will, if either there or cliewhere I have feemed to nod and take a little nap, Namque opere in longo fas est obrepere somnum: seeing that I have taken my felf in the manner, and not flept untill my neighbour awaked me.

tiept until my neighbout awaked me.

Listors in Livy are minifers or sergeants attending upon the magistrats of Rome; namely, Dictators, Consuls, Protors: for those only were called somitime magistrats xas "Egylw, as superior to the rest: so called (as Festus thinketh) quod fasces virgarum ligatos ferant, for that they carried rods tied up in bundles; which rods were of birch, willow, hazell, or the Carpine-tree, [a kind of Plane or Maple] and within them stuck an axe, all to signify whipping and death. These officers made way before those magistrats, and were ministers also of the execution.

Litum, was the Augurs flaff, much like a bishops croifier, crooked at the end.

Magifter Equitam. Mafter or general of the horfemen. This was an office or dignity among the Romans, incorporate as it were in the Dictator alone, who ever had the abfolute naming and chusing of him: and ordinarily narily he was subject to him, howsoever Minutim was by firong hand and a violent course of the people, made equal to Q.Fabius his Dictator. Commander he was under him of the Cavalry: also his Lieutenant-general and coadjutor with him in all executions. The same that Tribunus celerum in the time of the KK.

M'. with the note of A The forenames of postrophus, Maniu.

Manipulus, in an army, was at the first a petty company of ten fouldiers following one javelin having a wifp of herbs or hay fastned to the upper end, as a man would fay, an handful of men: used after, for a small band or squadron of souldiers: and Manipulares were they termed, who served in one such Manipulus.

Matuta, otherwise called Lencothea or Ino, the daughter of Cadmw. Into her temple, at the time of her solemn seast, might no maid servant enter: and if any did, they were fure to be beaten forth by the dames or wives there affembled; in remembrance of one Antigera, the chamber-maid of Ino, with whom her husband Athamas, as the thought, was more familiar than she liked well of.

Megalefia, were plaies or games at Rome, not (as the letter icemeth to import) Magni, which were Romani, but in the honour of Cylele the goddels, named also Idea, Magna mater i. the great mother of the gods.

Muleta decem millium aris gravis, &c. was no doubt, a fine of brasen mony set upon a mans head, after the weight of to much; every As weighing a lib, of 12 ounces, For before that filver was cast and stamped for coin, Es grave plaustris ad ararium convehebant (as Livy faith) when they paid tribute or subsidy to the City chamber, as they were affessed.

Murcea or Murtia, one of the names attributed. to Venu, quia prater modum, non moveret sed faceret hominem murcidum i nimis desidiosum & inalt wofum: contrary to that other goddels Agenoria qua ad agendum excitaret. And hereupon it is that Murtea is put for the godders of floth and litherners.

N

Nova tabula, was an easment proposed in favour of debters at Rome, whereby the old debt-books and obligations were cancelled, or the Nomina dashed out. Among the Athenians this practife was called Sifact hia.t. an easing of burden, or Chreocopia, a cutting offor firiking out of debts.

N. Numerius, a forename to some houses of Rome.

Nundina, were the market daies appointed every ninth day at Rome, for the peatants of the country to repair unto the City, to fell commodities or to buy their necessities. And hereupon Trinundinum, is the space of 27. daies, comprehending three market daies.

Nones, were daies in the month fo called, because they began the 9th day ever before the Ides: honored by the Romans both for the birthday of K. Servise; and also for the chasing out of the KK. for otherwise it was not festival (as Ovid, faith) Nonarum tutela Dee caret.

Vales or Ova, were eggs fet upon the goles in the folemnity of the horf-running, at the plaies Circenfes, to reckon or score up(as it feemeth by Livy) the races, which were performed with 24 courses to represent four and twenty hours of the day. Neither was it for nought, that choise was made of egs, rather than other things : for as egs are laid by birds (the swiftest of all other living creatures) so they also were to contend and strive to be most active,&c. or else because Castor & Pollux (those renowned horsemen) came of an egg, as Poets fable.

D. Publius, a forename to some Romansa-

Panatolium or Panatolaik, was a solemn diet or counsel, wherein all the states of Atolia asfembled to consult of publick affairs.

Patres, were at Rome 100 Senators or Noblemen, counsellers of state; chosen in this manner: 3 out of every one of the 30 Curio, and those make 90; 3 more out of each tribe, (which then were but three) and one by Romulus himself: and as this number made the body of the Nobility or Senat at the first; so, out of every Curia, he chose ten of the most personable and active yong men, to the number of 300, (which he called Celeres) to guard his person. From whence came the order of the knights or gentlemen of Rome; a mean degree between the two estates of Nobles and Commons, as it were the feminary, to replenish the Senat, when the places were void, and to augment the number of them. These were called Patres Conferipti, Aferipti, & Seletti. And like as the former were named Patres Majorum gentium; so the latter fort, Minorum gentium; alluding to the feveral ranges of the gods, who were some of them, Majorum gentium, fuch as ever were counted in heavenstermed also Selecti: others, Minorum gentium, who had been men, and were after canonized gods. The off spring and progeny of the Patres, were Patritii, in opposition evermore of Plebei,i. Commoners.

Porticus, were either the porches & other stately buildings before temples, as belonging unto them: or else goodly galleries and walking places apart by themselves; under which men retired in the rain, and where they used to walk to cool themselves in summer. Prada, Pada, booty, pillage, or faceage in the own kind, as it was gotten from the enemy, to wit, flaves, prisoners, beafts, goods, armor, &c. Manubia, the mony raised of such pillage or prey, fold.

Prator, one of the superior magistrats of Rome. In the City he ruled as L chief justice: in the province he commanded as L. governor and deputy; and was General in the field as well as the Conful. At first, the name of Conful, Pretor, and Judges, was all one.

Prarogativa centuria, were those centuries in Comitiu Centuriatis, which by lot had the first place in giving their voices: the rest that sollowed, were called Primo-vocate and Incewocate, and delivered their suffrages in their 1The children of the Patritii, until 17 years age. 2 All Senators upon festival daies. 3 Wardens at the games or plaies called Compitalitii. 4 All magiltrats, as well in the City, as in the colonies or borrough Towns incorporate, called Municipea, and Mafters of Confraternities, 5 Ail Priefts, and among them, the Augurs. 6 They that triumph And this differed from the rest, being wrought with gold and damask work.

It seemeth that these differed likewise one from the other, in the manner of the guarding; laid broader or narrower: as also in the rich or deep colour, wherupon they were called Dibaptra: or that some of these robes were all one purple, other but parcel. And wheras the gentlemen of Rome are laid Purpuram induere, it is to be understood either of angusti-clavus, or elle of fome lighter colour, 28 the violet, and not of that rich red purple, which is scarlet. For that robe which was done upon our Saviour Christ, * one of the Evangelists called nozirles, and other two, rosqueav.

Pullarius, the Chickmafter or pullitier: one that had the charge and overleeing of the facred chickens, kept in a pen or coup for auspicia: who by observing their gesture or feeding betimes every morning, related what was foretokened thereby good or bad. See more in Auspicia. Pro-conful. 7Some have thought, Pro-conful. Pro-pretor. Sthat they should be Pro-grafter. writte other wife thus, Proquestor. but they are in mine opinion out of the way: for in deed Pro-conful is he, who having bin Conful, went out of his magistracy at the years end, and nevertheless was sent forth into his Province again with full Confular authority: whereas Pre-confule (to fpeak precifely) is the Viz-conful, namely, one that having never been Conful created, but some privat person, yet upon an urgent occasion, might for the while supply the place of the Conful. The fame is to be faid of the rest. And hereof you may read in the oration of Cicero, pro lege Manilia. Howbeit in my translation of Livy I have fortime used Viz-pretor and Viz-conful, for Pro-pretor and Pro-conful: because that manner of composition frameth well with our terms in English Moreover, we read once in Livy of a Pro-dictator, in the proportionable fignification to the other.

Madrigati, were the Denarii Romani, having the stamp of a chariot drawn with four horses, called Quadriga.

Quadrans, a peece of bale brais coin or poile at Rome, the fourth part of As, which is a cue and a c.

Quaftors, were inferior officers in Rome, as treafurers to receive and lay out the City-mony, whereof there were Urbani, Provinceales, and Castrenses.

Quaftorium, a plot or quarter in the Roman camp, where the treasurer lodged and other officers of the camp.

Q. Quintus, the forename of fundry Romans. Quindecemviri, the same that Duumviri first, and Decemviri facris faciundis. Their number was 15, and albeit they were encreased by Silla Dictator to 60, yet they retained ftil the name of Quindecemviri.

Quintana was a gate in the Roman camp, at which, provision was brought in to serve the market. Read the annotation in the end of English Tacions.

Quinqueviri Menfarii, were certain men, five in number, appointed upon occasion to difcharge the debts of the commons, so called of Menfa, a table fet out in publick place; upon which they either counted or weighed their mony.

Quinqueviri muris reficiendis, were five officers at Rome chosen extraordinarily for repairing of the walls and turrets of the City.

Quinquatras or Quinquatria, were certain feafts and games at Rome in the honor of Minerva. *Math. 27.
They continued five daies, and began the fift *Marc. 15. day after the Ides of March, i. the 20 of lobn 19.

March: and these were called Quinquatrus Majores. For others named Minores, fel about the Ides of June, and that was the minfrels holiday, as appeareth in the ninth of Livy. Quintilis, the month of Inly, before Iulius Ca-

fars time. Quirinalia, was a festival day to Quirinus, appointed for them to facrifice, who had neg-lected or miffed to do divine fervice in their parish at the feast Fornacalia: and it was called the fools holiday; for that they were ignorant of the time of the former feaft, or knew not their own Curia.

Quirites, the name appropriate to the citizens of Rome: and so they loved to be called within the City: but in the camp, if the General gave them that term, it was taken for a great difgrace unto fouldiers and men of

R Orarii, were light armed footmen, refembling our forlorn hope: fo called a rore. i.

Dew. For like as there falleth commonly a drifling dew before a good fhour of rain: fo thefe Rorarii skirmifhed loofly, before the legionary fouldiers came to the battail.

Roftra, were three-tined pikes of brais, fet in the mole or beak-head of war-ships to offendly the enemy, as appeareth by Virgil, Roftrifj: tridentibus: and thereupon by Synecdache, the stems of ships were so called. And for that the publick pulpit for orations at Rome, was reared and adorned with such, it also was called Rostra.

Rudera, [Gum milites religione tacti rudera jacerent.] To make sense of this place, I have translated Rudera, peeces of brass mony : for that I cannot see what should be meant by rubbish stone in that place, which was not demolished by Annibal, for any thing that I can find; but only robbed of the filver & gold within the chappel of Feronia: in stead wherof were found aris acervi: by reason that the fouldiers, who had some sence of religion & touch of conscience (whereof their leader Annibal had never any) cast from them [Rudera. Now probable it is that Rudera, is corruptly put for era, the later end of the word: or if we admit Rudera: it is well known that Rudus as well as as fignifieth brass and brasen mony, as appeareth by Ruduseulum the diminutive: for as of as came Afoulum, fo of Rudus (no doubt) Rudusculum: and like as of Æsculum, Æsculanus, a god of the Painims, father of Argentinus (because copper & brais mony was before filver coin:) fo, of Rudu foulum, the gate Rudusculana in Rome, set out with brais. Now that Rudusculum is put for a small peece of brass coin, it is proved by the form of words in buying and felling, and in manumission (Rudusculo libram ferito) which is all one with are Libram percute or feri. By which I collect that Rudera in this place may stand for ara, i peeces of coin. For there went afore, aris acervi, which Horace putteth for heaps of brais mony, and not for braien images. And well it may be, that the fouldiers upon some devotion, threw into the Church their oblations of such mony as they had in their belts or bandoliers. This conjecture & confirmation of mine may ferve, untill fomewhat here may be made of rubbish stone, or better exposition come in place. The word (I am fure will bear it, and the context in all fence and congruity, doth require it.

S Aluture Dear] after a devout and reverent manner they bowed unto the Idols or gods of the heathen as they paffed by, and with al, touched their hands: which Lucretius thewesh is these verses,

Seeleratus Vicus, a firect in Rome named beforetime Cyprius, which in the Sabine language fignifieth [good:] but upon occasion of a wicked act committed therein, it was by the contrary, called Seeleratus.

Secoffion, was a general infurrection and revolt of the commons in Rome, wherein they left the City, until fuch time as they had the authority of their Tribuns firengthned and confirmed: yea, and certain laws enacted and established by a folemn eath, with a curfe denounced to all them that went about to abrogate or abolish the same: which thereupon were called Sacrataleges.

Sex. Sextus. Sall, forenames to Ro-Serg. Sergius. Sall, forenames to Ro-Servius. Sarvius.

Sextilis, the month of August, so called by the Romans before Augustus Casar his daies, for that it was the fixt in number: as Quintilis the fift, beginning at March.

Suburta 97 2. In Inventue or graffanten in Suburra. It might well be that yonkers there made a fray or committed fomeriot and felony: for it was a freer most of all others fraquenteds and besides, in it kept strumpets and currifans, like enough to give occasion of much quarrel & missule among youth, as appeareth by Invenal and Martial in this Dititichon.

Fama non nimium bonas puella, Quales in media sedent Suburra.

Suffrages, were the voices of the people given by Centuries, Curiæ, or tribes, which in Rome went aftirmatively under this form. Usirogas, is be in according to your bill: and negatively thus, Antiques, I deny or reject it.

Sordidati, were they that changed their weed in reatm. i. (whiles either themselves or their friends were in trouble and danger of judgment) that is to say, put off white, which was the ordinary colour, and did on black: but if they changed their apparel upon forrow and mourning for the loss of friends or any publick calamity, they were called rather Publation of Arrati.

Sella Curulis, a seat or chair of estate. One of the regal ornaments at Rome, belonging to the Kings first : afterwards, during thefreestate, used by Dictators, Consuls, Pro-consuls, Pretors, and Propretors, Cenfors and Ædiles, namely, those called curules, for distinction from those that were Plebeii: and last of all, by the emperors in the time of the monarchy. This chair was made of Ivory: on which the abovesaid magistrats usually sat, not only in the Senat-house when they consulted or gave andience, or when they beheld the publik games & plaies, & rode either in triumph, or otherwife in thestreets, mounted upon their Chariots: but also at home within their private houses,& whersoever else it pleased them : & this badge or enfign of honor they had both in time of their magistracy,& asterwards: & as fuch Senators were called Curules (for the reft, who had not attained to those dignities, they named Pedanes, as some think, for that they went on foot to the Senat or places before mentioned) so those magistrats likewise aboyes and, were entitled by the name of Curule. And Curuli was that chair called either, of Curus, a chariot, for that they sate thereupon within their chariots; or, quasicalleit was made crooked or curbwise, like unto our folding chairs.

Senator, A Counfelior of Hate, A name it was of honor, and not of age-as the word impliest if to that place men attained often times very yong. Senat was the body of that degree and common Councel, opposite unto Plebs at Rome, namely, when it was biceps and the whole people comprehended under Senatoring rdo and Plebsius.

Sextans, a small bracen peece of mony at Rome, which being the fixt part of As, cometh to a cue or half a farthing.

Sextarius: was the Basis of measures in Rome, as As of weights and look how As was divided into twelve ounces, so Sextarius into twelve eyabi, and in measures Sextarius as the fath part of Sextarius, which weighed twenty ounces, much about a wine pint and a half a-of Sibyls books so often mentioned in Livy, which being three in number, were bought of Sibyls by King Tarquin the prond, at the price of nine, after she had burned six of them before his face; which books were kept diligently in the Capitol: and wherout the Decemyins by their learning made report of the will and pleasure of the gods, See A. Gellius, 1 books ay chapter.

Signum, was the general name of all the enfigns in the field, But Aquila more particularly was the main standard to a whole legion: so called, for that upon the top of a spear was reared and fastned an Eagle in filver at full relief, and the same sometime was gilded standing upon a base or footstal of the same mettal. The other enfigns, as well of cohorts, which were bands of five hundred men ufually, as of centuries, i, companies of hundred, named more especially Vexilla, and were gonerally called Signa, had the portaiture of Minotaures, wolves, bores, horles, dragons, with fundry other devices according to the fancy of the Colonels or captains, containing also the name of the cohort or Century, and the legion to which they belonged.

T Alentum Atticum, As wel ponderale which was weighed, as numerale or numeralism, which was counted in mony, was of two forts. The less of fixty pound Attick, and every one of them confided of a hundred Drachma or Denavii Romani, If Minathen, be three pound two finitings fix pence, steeling, the less talent Attick amounted to 187 pound ten finitings of our English mony. The great ter, or simply the great, talent, in Livy, is fourfcore mine, and hath proportionen extrativo or Sefautertram, is minut, which cometh to two hundred and fifty pound flerling. Now was the Euboick talent (whereof Livy also speaketh) half of Talentum majus Atticum.

T.Titus. A forename to many houses of the Romans.

Testudo, A target-fence, which the I egionary Romans souldiers, made either in the open field when they were overcharged with their enemies, or in approaching the walls of Towns to give affault. In the former, after they had enclosed within them their baggage and light armed men, they rested themselves upon their knees, with their targets close, couched together over their heads, to avoid the enemies shot: and after they had well breathed they would rife up all at once again, tresh and lusty to a new skirmith. In the later, they had the like target-roof, but pent-house wife, one overlapped the other after the manner of tiles, and to they scaled walls without offence from above.

Templum hath in Livy three figuifications, 1, a facted house or chappel dedicated to some god or goddes for divine service, as the temple of Japiter in the Capitol, &c. 2. An open places from whence a man might see all about him, as having nothing to hinder his prospect, and which likewise might be seen from all parts, whereof cometh the verb Contemplart, i, to behold. And such did the Augurs Chuse for to take their signs of bird-flight, 3. Any place hallowed, although not for divine service, yet for debating of serious human affairs, as their Curiæ and Counsel-Chambers, yea, and the Rostra at Rome.

Thalafio, An Auspicate or lucky word used at Bridals or weddings in Rome, like to this among the Greeks. virtus & virtus virtus diplus Hymen. O Hymenae, hymen, & Catul.

Thenfa, wherof Livy writeth in the fifth & ninth books, were certain petry chariots or dreyes of filver or ivory, carrying the images and ornaments of their gods in great pomp upon certain high daies: and they who led the horfes drawing the fame, wore their richest apparel, holding in their hands and training the falle reins ftretched out at length in lolemn wife, whereupon Faftas thinketh they took the name Thenfa qualif Infa.

Trabea was a roial robe or mantle of effate, all of deep purple or scarlet only at the first but afterwards, embrodered richly with gold. Livy seemeth to consound it with Vessus paraparea, Pista, Palmara, and Trinmphalis. And in truth, all one they were in the principal substance and matter thereof, namely, purple or scarlet: but different in the setting out, being embrodered with gold, more or 'ess, diffinguished allo with white among (for that was a roial colour) as may appear by the diadem, which was a white wreath, or band done about the head of Kings, or in the maner of the works for either it was palma a so

CHRISTINA,

By the Grace of God Queen of the Swedes, Goths, Vandals and the adjoyning Provinces.

T hath happily faln out, that your wonderful Humanity and Learning, rarely to be found in so great a Majesty, have given me advantage of omitting one of those two subjects which usually are the Contents of Dedicatory Epistles. For I have so many reasons to declare why I present this Supplement to your Majesty, that if I were forced likewise to declare the Argument of the Work, to what

End, and in what Manner it is contrived, I could not accomplish it without a long and tedious Epifile. But now those Your two Virtues I mentioned, have freed me of this Neceffity, seeing out of your Humanity you condescended to read the Work while it was in Composing and by your Learning more fully understood, then I or any other could expound what was superfluous, and what wanting in it. I will not therefore accuse the meanesse of my Wit or Learning, or any other thing, that this my Design hath no more happily succeeded, (Let those men pretend shortnesse of time, multitude of businesse or incommodities of fickneffe, who aim at other Glory be fides that of Obedience) it sufficeth me, I am conscious, that in writing this, I have observed the benefit of your Studies, and in making it Publick been Obedient to Your Will. For when in compiling the Relicks of LIVX's HISTORY, which at that time you diligently read, I had finished this Work as a Bridge over a broken Paffage, Youwere pleased (according to Your excellent and well known Goodnesse) to expresse Your liking of my Endeavors; and, as Your Self thereby had reaped Benefit, fo to judg them fit of Publick View, that others might likewise be profited by them. Wherein You manifested both your Wisdome and your Bounty : Your Bounty, in that what was folely intended for your own ferroice, you were willing should be useful unto all a Cour Wisdom in that, in this new beginning and encrease of Learning, which by your example and Help the North doth greedily receive and happily improve. you have encouraged other men to exercise their Wit and Industry in publishing more Accurate and Learned Writings, when they shall have understood with how much Candor and Clemency You accept this rude and unpolished Piece of mine. When therefore Lee not only those who are born unto your service, but many also of strange Nations most willingly antertain and execute your Commands: Should I at all be back. ward in my Duty, sho, if not alone, yet among ft a few of your most Faithful and nearest subjects, amin a peculiar manner obliged by your Majesty? I am indeed His neither do I bear a mind inferior to fo great a Hope: But as to the Offices of this Life I am by him bestowed upon your Majesty, as by infallible Arguments, to your self not unknown, may be demonstrated. Wherefore my constant and resolved Rule of lin very (which, if I attain not unto, as I am willing and ought to do, yet I aim at and endeapour) is to attends God's will only in those things which are expressly commanded or forbidden; in Actions indifferent and arbitrary to be guided by your Majestie alone:

which I the rather strive to perform, because I know it is your Pleasure. And trule this were a sufficient tie of my Obedience and Reverence, if you had not other wife both by your Virtues and Deferts obliged me, both which are so ample and of so effectual an Influence, that it is hard to fay whether in Contemplation of them I am more willing to fer ve you, or for other Reasons more strictly bound to it. I find my self now involved in a very doubtful Cafe, and on both fides much perplexed: For if I say what I have intended, as my desire is, and as is Just and Right, I may happly not be relished by your Majestie, who do more freely exercise your Virtues, and fasten your Favours. then willingly hear them repeated. And if in the Mention thereof I shall omit any thing, I shall fail in my Duty, and Detract from Your Praises, which (with as fervent a defire and good will as I projecute them) had I liberty to expatiate. I could in no wife according to their Dignity fet forth, much less being streightned within the narrow limits of an Epistle. Nevertheless I am confident that the Temper of the business (which your self cannot difallow) is agreeable as to the present purpose, so to both our Dispositions. For L abhor Flattery as doth your Majestie : neither am I more willing to speak any thing in such a strain, then Your self to hear it. And, according to your discerning Spirit, you are not ignorant that I am of this mind, that if it were in my choice whether to offend

You in doing You Good, or please You by Flattery, I should without scruple chiefe the former, which few Subjects can do and few Princes endure. Hinder not therefore my desires which cannot offend on that part: Give us leave to acknowledge what we have received; and if miserable men are freely allowed to complain, why should your Majestie forbid us modestly to boast of our Happinesse under such a Prince as Your self?

Neither ought this, the only Reward of your good Deeds, or the Fruit of our Thankfulness to perifh; we then again a fresh receive benefits when we repeat them. But I fee what is happened, whileft I beg leave to Write I loofe both Time and Space. What therefore I am about to Jay, shall be into a few Periods divested, and I shall of every kind freak somewhat only in Summe. As to those your Virtues wherewith you have magnificently Adorned this Empire: that I may briefly declare what I think I shall borrow a Sentence from our beloved Tacitus ; in which Author, You know, Tiberius reproach-eth C. Cælar, That he had all the Vices of L. Sylla. but not so much as one of his Virtues which may justly be inverted as to Your Majestie that You have acquired all the Virtues of Your Predecessors, omitting what Vices were in them, insomuch as You have augmented their Ancient Honours by Virtues new and heretofore unknown to this Kingdom. I believe that former Ages wanted not excellent Kings, yet, however it came to pals, the Swetick affairs never ascended to any illustrious or durable greatness in their dayes; the Praise of that work properly belongs to the Gustavides, of whom not any one ever Reigned without some Memorable profit to the Countrie for even the Error of some have proved of good use; the Case of Ericus and Sigilmund instructeth Posterity wherein Kings may offend : and others are admonished by the severity of Charles, how unsafe it is to provoke Princes to Anger. But what Pen or what Oration can fufficiently declare the Immortal benefits reaped from the two Gustavi? They were both so great; that if you compare them with others, you will eafily prefer them before others; but if you compare them between themselves, you will rather conclude that this was Greatest and the other Greatest, then discerne which of the two excelled. For it is a great Error and blindnesse of judgment to measure the Greatnesse of Kings by the outward Splendor of their Actions, and respect that only.

It happens often to these Stars on Earth as to those in Heaven, that some indeed are the greater though others seem to be so. But this is manifest, that God had Ordained by two Princes especially to advance the glorie of this Kingdom, even by Gusta-Vus the Great, and his Daughter CHRISTINA. He indeed was the more endowed with Warlike Virtues, yet so as when he had leisure from the Field, he did most Accurately and Skilfully manage affairs at Home: God having referved Your felfe. Madam, to a greater work the Recoverie, Establishment and Ornament of Peace bath every way accomplished You for so great a Task; yet so, as while there was a necessitie of War. You could not complain of any thing wanting in Your self to the highest Praise in such an Employment. For whereas little is to be attributed to bodily exercife. You were found eminent in all those Virtues of the Mind which are required in the baft Emperors, as Counsel in Perlexities, Constancy in Adversity, Moderation in Prosperity Diligence, Wisdom, Faithfulness in all things : whereby after many and famous Vi-Chories, You concluded Peace with Denmark in the first year of your Reigne, and in the fourth year a most glorious and advantageous one with the German Emperor. Which peace how and by what means you have adorned, I cannot in this Hast declare . I Shall only name the encrease of the City, many Towns built and well constituted. Justice established, the People eased in their Taxes Manners amended, the Honor and Reward of Learning encreased the Universities enriched. Schools erected, Merchandize flourish. ing, many Manufactures newly invented, the Ground manured beyond the simplicity of the Ancients ; your care and diligence adhibited toward the Commodity of Travel, measuring of High-wayes, building of Inns, and indeed toward all things which we see, which we are Sensible of , and the benefit whereof we enjoy; so that I may justly account those my Countrymen of Germany happy who shal hereafeer rest under your Protection: whom I would have. with my felf and all other Your Subjects, think no fign furer of God's Anger or Favour tomard them, then as he shall lone preserve, or suddenly take away such a Prince from amongst them. If there be any who dare not lift up their Eys by reason of the misery of times past, or are so hindred by the Interposition of clouds that they could not hitherto behold this Bright Star, be comforted with its Aspect, and refreshed with its Heat: They may justly be encouraged to expect all things happy and prosperous near at hand, not only by the greatnesse of so Benigue and Favourable a Light, but also by the Constancy thereof. For the Splendor of it is not derived, as that of a Candle or Torch, which failing, the remaining substance appears fouler; but like that of the Sun, True, and Pure, and Innate! neither to be consumed by Time, or extinguished by Violence: which now shineth openly to those who dwell afar off, and will so dispell all Clouds from before their Eyes, that you shall find none so blind as cannot see it, or impudently injurious to their own judements do to denie they fee it. But though it be troublefome to me to draw my mind from this sweet and pleasing Contemplation. I shall not endeavour to comprehend the mention of these Virtues within the narrow Limits of this Paper, this Time or this my little Wit, which ought in whole Volumes to be declared to all Nations and Ages. I shall make bold to be more Prolice in the Commemoration of your benefits

CHRISTINA;

By the Grace of God Queen of the SWEDES, GOTHS, VANDALS and the adjoyning Provinces.

T hath happily fain out, that your wonderful Humanity and Learning, rarely to be found in so great a Majesty, have given me advantage of omitting one of those two subjects which usually are the Contents of Dedicatory Epistles. For I have so many reasons to declare why I present this Supplement to your Majesty, that if I were forced likewise to declare the Argument of the Work, to what

I will not therefore accuse the meanesse of my Wit or Learning, or any other thing, that this my Design hath no more happily succeeded, (Let those men pretend shortnesse of time, multitude of businesse or incommodities of sicknesse, who aim at other Glory besides that of Obedience) it sufficeth me, I am conscious, that in writing this, I have observed the benefit of your Studies, and in making it Publick been Obedient to Your Will. For when in compiling the Relicks of LIVY'S HISTORY, which at that time you diligently read, I had finished this Work as a Bridge over a broken Paffage, You were pleased (according to Your excellent and well known Goodnesse) to expresse Your liking of my Endeavors; and, as Your Self thereby had reaped Benefit, fo.to judg them fit of Publick View that others might likewise be profited by them. When therefore I fee not only those who are born unto your service, but many also of strange Nations most willingly entertain and execute your Commands: Should I at all be backward in my Duty, who, if not alone, yet among ft a few of your most Faithful and nearest subjects, am in a peculiar manner obliged by your Majesty? the immortal benefits reaped from the two Gustavi? They were both so great; that if you compare them with others, you will eafily prefer them before others, but if you compare them between themselves, you will rather conclude that this was Greatest and the other Greatest, then discerne which of the two excelled. For it is a great Error and blindnesse of judgment to measure the Greatnesse of Kings by the outward

It happens often to these Stars on Earth as to those in Heaven, that some indeed are the greater though others seem to be so. But this is manifest, that God had Ordained by two Princes especially to advance the glorie of this Kingdom, even by Gustavus the Great, and his Daughter CHRISTINA. He indeed was the more endowed with Warlike Virtues, yet so as when he had leisure from the Field, he did most Accurately and Skilfully manage affairs at Home: God having referved Your felfe, Madam, to a greater work, the Recoverie, Establishment and Ornament of Peace. hath every way accomplished You for so great a Task; yet so, as while there was a necefsitie of War, You could not complain of any thing wanting in Your felf to the highest Praile in such an Employment. For whereas little is to be attributed to bodily exercife, You were found eminent in all those Virtues of the Mind which are required in the best Emperors, as Counsel in Perlexities, Constancy in Adversity, Moderation in Prosperity, Diligence, Wisdom Faithfulness in all things; whereby after many and famous Vi-Stories, You concluded Peace with Denmark in the first year of your Reigne, and in the fourth year a most glorious and advantageous one with the German Emperor. Which peace how and by what means you have adorned, I cannot in this Haft declare; I shall only name the encrease of the City, many Towns built and well constituted, Justice established, the People eased in their Taxes Manners amended, the Honor and Reward of Learning encreased, the Universities enriched, Schools erected, Merchandize flourish. ing, many Manufactures newly invented, the Ground manured beyond the simplicity of the Ancients : your care and diligence adhibited toward the Commodity of Travel, measuring of High-wayes, building of Inns, and indeed toward all things which we fee, which we are fensible of , and the benefit whereof we enjoy; so that I may sustly account those my Countrymen of Germany happy who shal hereafetr rest under your Protection: whom I would have. with my felf and all other Your Subjects, think no fign furer of God's Anger or Favour toward them, then as he shall long preserve, or suddenly take away such a Prince from amongst them. If there be any who dare not lift up their Eys by reason of the misery of times past, or are so hindred by the Interposition of clouds that they could not hitherto behold this Bright Star, be comforted with its Aspect, and refreshed with its Heat: They may justly be encouraged to expect all things happy and prosperous near at hand, not only by the greatnesse of so Benigne and Favourable a Light, but also by the Constancy thereof. For the Splendor of it is not derived, as that of a Candle or Torch, which failing, the remaining substance appears fouler; but like that of the Sun, True, and Pure, and Innate! neither to be consumed by Time, or extinguished by Violence: which now shineth openly to those who dwell afar off, and will so dispell all Clouds from before their Eges, that you shall find none so blind as cannot see it, or impudently injurious to their own judgments as to denie they see it. But though it be troublesome to me to draw my mind from this sweet and pleasing Contemplation, I shall not endeavour to comprebend the mention of these Virtues within the narrow Limits of this Paper, this Time, or this my little Wit, which ought in whole Volumes to be declared to all Nations and Ages. I shall make bold to be more Prolixe in the Commemoration of your benefits bestowed on me, as being not so well known to the World, and more properly belonging to the Causes of this Dedication, as likewise not unworthy Monuments of your Virtues. But I must first acknowledge the Providence of God which I have alwaies found most manifestly present in this businesse. When for many years in Germany I continued in such a condition of life (for many reasons thereunto personading me) as not resolutely addicted to any particular Profession, yet ready to accept of any which should lawfully offer it felf: in all that while no man determined my liberty with obligation to any calling. In the mean time I spent not that my leifure in idlensse, but bestowed it in those Studies to the which (by what afterward hapned, I evidently understood) I was from me infancie ordained. The time now grew on, Madam, wherein I was to be dedicated to Your Majesties Service, and Benedict Skytte came to Argentoratus, whom Your Majestie hath deservedly honoured with many Favors, and lastly with the Dignitie of a Senator. By him invited I came to Your Universitie, where instructing the Youth with care and diligence, though I had an earnest desire to see Your Majestie, yet I preferred the necessitie of my present Office, before the sweetnesse of an happinesse not yet due to me. When I had now three years been debarred of any Conference with your Majestie, having lately taken upon Your Self the Administration of Your Realm, upon occasion of a Funeral You came to Ubsal. And from that time I shall begin the Commemoration of Your Favours towards me. The last Office of Love was then performed to my Patron John Skytte Senator, whose praises according to the Dutie of my Place, I endeavoured to set forth in a Funeral Oration; and this was the first Speech I made in Your hearing: But when by the cheerfulness of your most Serene Countenance. You discovered both Your understanding of what was spoken, and Your Favour to the Speaker, I was so infinitely possessed with Pleasure and Admiration, that thenceforward I resolved to esteem You not only as a Queen of Me and Your Kingdomes, but Princesse of all Virtues and Wisdom. The same Favour I received two years after, when as often as you came to Ubial, you heard my Discourses upon any Subject you propounded. Intending afterward to accumulate more Favours upon me, You invited me to Court, not only beyond my Hope, but befides my Thoughts of any such thing: what You there bestowed upon me, can scarce by a long Oration be declared: You made me Keeper of Your Librarie, then which I know none so soon after its first beginning, more plentiful in Books, which hath been a main help to me in Compiling this Supplement. You gave me the Title of your Historiographer, that when you should think fit I might deliver to Posterity the Memory of things done or to be transacted. You afforded me Lodging in your Court, not only very convenient, but (which is rarely found in so frequented a Place) very private and quiet also, and a Stipend, which by experience I have found, very subject to Envy. And whereas these may be esteemed Favours of the highest rank, you have, by what after followed, cansed them to be esteemed small ones : For when you defired the Knowledge of the Greek Tongue, that you might from their own Mouths understand the sense of the most excellent writers in Civil and Moral VV isdom, you did so by degrees induce me to the Office of your Instructer therein, being ignorant of your Purpose, that at length I understood I had taught much indeed, when on the sudden I found you had Learnt so much. By this your Art in that small time you could allow out of two years to such a Study (being a Queen actually Reigning, waging VVar, often holding Parliaments, every day Councels, and constantly distracted with other business you made such an improvement that after Trial in Polybius and Plutarch, you read Plato also, and that with such understanding, that fignificant Expressions, and of Your self observe and for true reasons Correct the Error of Translations made with the great pains of Learned men. Whereby I reaped fo great and various fruits of purest pleasure, as I could not but often ingenuously confesse to my most intimate acquaintance, That whatsoever Time, or Labour, or Study, or Care 1 bestowed in this employment (for Trouble, I call my Conscience to witnesse, I never felt any) I thought all abundantly recompensed with that reward I could every hour receive from you. For to omit other benefits, what an advantage was even in this, to be every day in the presence of so great a Prince, to be seen and countenanced by You, to obtain the Title, Place and Honour of a Favourite? Truly my Happinesse seemed so great to me, that I began to be afraid of it. For though, by the Grace of God, I ever put off these my worldly Accountements, as knowing I must one day leave them or they me, yet out of impotency of mind I might by too great happiness have grown insolent, but that by certain Arguments I learnt in time to know that so great a fortune was not conferred as Due to any man's Merits, but as the free gift of your Grace and good will. And in this fo high and great an Happinesse there are many excellent Circumstances particularly considerable. I am tied only to my own Vocation, employed only in mine own Studies, that is, I am fo free that I am not employed and wearied in any service not proper to my own Office and calling. Neither have you a care of my Time and Health only, but also of my Modesty and Bashfulnesse: I appear not but at the time of your Studies, neither then do I break in without command, to stand as an idle and dumb Spectator, vainly loofing time. or boldly vaunting of my Liberty and Familiarity Neither is my work base or vile, we do nothing which requires either Secrecy or Excuse; whosoever will not betray his own ignorance must needs confesse the employment, on my part worthy of a man, on yours becoming a Prince. Hitherto I have related part of the Favours you have besto wed on my Per-Son; it remains likewise I should acknowledge those Favours (as much more bestowed on me) which you have conferred on others by my Intercession: In which confession I have cause to fear, that I shall not only contract Envy tomy selfe, but give Occasion to others to accuse your Majestie, as being two Facile in granting what is requested. To these I stall answer, That I do indeed acknowledge and admire your Goodnesse which hath far exce. my Deferts, and that others also may obtain equal or greater Favours if they ask them with the same Respect that I have done: as first, I never defired any thing but what was Just and Equal; nor secondly, any thing misbecoming the Office and Majestie of my Prince; thirdly, by all those Boons I have obtained for others, I know not that I am a penny the richer. But in this strait, wherein it is easier to think of more things then to write them, many things come into my mind which I am forced to pretermit. This I shall say, I am in doubt whether I am more beholding to your Majestie for small favors bestowed at my Request, or for the great ones; for as these carried the greater Price the others did more manifest your Humanitie. That your mind capable of highest things would condescend to so little ones. We Read of a King, who when a Phylosopher asked of him a Groat, said, It was too little for a King to give; when he presently asked u Talent; faid, It was too much for a Phylosopher to receive. Your Majestie hath more magnificently used the same Method, in Your smaller favours, regarding what was fit for me to receive; in the greater what became Your felf to give. With the like Clemency You have had compassion on some miserable men (whom I therefore commended to Your Majestie because none had pity on them) and done that which I dare yet scarce speak, both for the Greatnesse of the Thing, and for the Greatnesse of the Thanks due, which cannot at present be expressed. But I may happly be accused of Folly, that I should think your favours may be more Elegantly declared or praised by any man's Oration, then by your own Deeds and Works; or that I should think you stand in need of my Commendation for having bountifully remitted to the City of the Vangiones the greater part of their Taxes, by which benefit I believe the City was preserved, and shall do well and justly if they honour your Majestie as a second Foundrels; You have hereby for ever obliged the Commonwealth of the Vangiones, and me in particular, making us your everlasting Debtors. For I know not who of Right oweth most to you, they who received the benefit or he who procured it at your Hands. Is there any thing can be equalled to , or preferred before what I have already faid? Yes furely even this, In that you have promiled to make me a better man, not, as all men are improved, by Laws and Manners, nor, as many, by Example, but, as yet none, by Your care and Diligence in Conversing with me: For you have promised to make Enquiry with me (that is to direct and shew me) how Wife and Prudent men ought to be qualified, and by what fignes they may be discovered; which when I have learned, I make no question of being much better then now I am. And I so much value this your Promise, that I would not free your Majestie from vour Obligation for half your Kingdom: And I shall not refuse, whensever You Command to declare the Reasons of this my Resolution. And to perform this, will, I suppose, be neither unpleasant to You, nor yet Difficult, seeing You tend forward to the height of that Wisdom, which even among the Learned you shall find more who pretend to teach then do indeed truly know ounderstand it. In this thing I may wel boast whereby I am more happy, not only then ordinary men, but the servants of Solomon himself, who are justly esteemed happy in having opportunity of hearing his Wisdom, but would have been much more happy if he had taken peculiar Care to have instructed them in his own Person which we read not he ever did. But I perceive that contrary to my will and the nature of my Argument, the very Paper admonisheth me to make an end. I shall therefore now be filent, humbly adoring your Majestie, and giving You to understand, That not only this Book is Dedicated to Your Majestie, but my whole self with all my Soul and the Affections thereof, with what I am, or have, or can do, being for Your fake fimply to do any thing what soever without exception, unless what is against Conscience, Leyond my Abilities to perform.

HE Power of the Samnites was now by many Battels much broken, nelither was any doubt made of happily finishing the War, in case the Enemy in this low and weak condition were prevented of time sufficient to recollect and strengthen his spirits. Therefore D. Fabius the Consul. In the year now in the heat of his Youth, and assuring himself the glory of putting from the sounce of the heat of his Youth, and assuring himself the glory of putting from the sounce of the sum tending on their Triumph, laid hold on that opportunity, and what with the Relicks of their former Armies, and some new Levies, had gathered together a considerable force, and because they knew the Plague was at Rome, and had heard that the present Consulis were men not much to be seared, either for any experience in Marshal assiar, or for any great Authority they had, they grew considered, invaded, depopulated, and wasted the Territories of the Campanians whom Livie Book 7 they had alwayes hated, but now more vehemently, looking on them as the Authors of the dan-ch-31 gers and calamities they now sustained. The Roman General had a heart no way misbecoming the dignity of his Fabina-Family, but the small account he made of a Nation 10 often beaten by his Country-men, and his earnestness of being in action, did at this time quite bereave him of all Counsel and Deliberation. He marcheth swiftly towards the enemy, and having discovered the Samnite scouts, who upon sight of the Roman troops retired back to their own main Body, and judging this to be a slight of the whole Host, without any consideration had either of the place or the condition of his men, he commands in all hast that may be the Battet to be begun, as if the hope of Victory consisted only in Expedition: But the Samnites having notice of their approach, were very circumspech, had seized on advantageous places, marshalled their Army, and incensed the minds of their Souldiery with their commanders Orations; and consequently the Event of the Battel was accordingly; for the Samnites being in good Rank, and well prepared, made no great business to rout the Romans, being very weary with their journey and furious march, out of all order, as if they came tanter to plunder then to fight. Three Europius B2, thousland of Fabius his men were lost, a greater number wounded, and only by the benefit of Sudata in Suchonian of the Charles of the Night was the total destruction of his Army prevented. Then retiring to a more commod. Miximus. ous place, as well as in such the living, every one with horror and despair waiting for the next day as their last. For being tired with labour, distempered with long watchings, weakned with wounds, terrified with an unlucky overthrow, and their number much diminished, they thought it impossible to resist the enemy, whom when they were found and entire both in body and mind, and filled with hopes of Victory, they were not able to encounter upon even terms. Things being at this ill paffe, the Remedy (as it often happens) proceeded from the enemies miltake, who daunted with the Runew forces would furround him, contented himself with what successe he had above his hope obtained, and diverced his course another way. The Enemy being removed, the Romanslikewife betook themselves to a safer Refuge : when these tidings were brought to Rome, the City was exceedingly moved, not so much with the losse, as the disgrace of the business, and took it deeply to heart. That the longest war they were ever troubled with, when it was now just at a period, should by the rashness of one Consul be revived again, and that more formidably then before, by reason of the great hopes and considence which the Samnites would assume in contemplation of this their fuccels. Neither was this the sense of the Tribunes of people alone. whose proper art it was by their frequent Orations to fill the Citizens minds with envy and hatred, but even the Fathers, upon discuss of the bufiness, pronounced very heavy and severe sentences, and a Decree was made by the Senate, That Fabius the Conful Should be commanded at a Dio spud Vale- certain day appointed to come and plead his cause at Rome. He was no sooner at Rome, but a fwarm of accusers flew about him; and indeed the fault could not be excused, and what was only left of moment on his behalf, even the esteem of old Fabius, was made use of as an argument against him; for they thought him least of all men to be pardoned, who being extracted from fo Illustrious a Parent, and brought up in the midst of his Fathers triumphs, had, by his Imprudence with so foul an overthrow, cast a stain not only on the Roman Glory, but on the renown of his own Family, and the many victories of his Ancestors obtained. Their minds being thus exasperated (that it was not likly the Desendant should have a fair hearing) were first by the consideration of his Fathers eminent Piety, and afterward with his Oration totally appealed. For he fearing leaft for this milicarriage his person would be removed from his Command, infifted not at all in exculing the Crime, but modefuly recounting his own and his forefathers merits, defired there might not be in his old age fo ignominious a Character imprinted on the Fabian Family: Neither did he require that for the fake of fo many other Fabii, who almost from the foundation of the City, had by their virtue and counsel augmented the Roman Empire; nor that for the lake of those three hundred Fabii, who by their own deaths, and almost the total loss of the Fabian Name, had protected the Commonwealth, the error of one fingle person should be forgiven, if it were found remediless, and that a greater commodity would accrue from the punishment then the preservation of his son. But whatsoever was in this young man to be feared, is already come to pass, whereas unless we cut off our own hopes, 'I cannot fay by an unjust, but by an untimely severity, Those many good deeds which his spirit 'and lively Genius, which likewife his virtue (by me, in your esteem, none of the worst Tu-tors, being disciplin'd and directed) doth fairly promise, are yet justly to be expected. It hath turned to the improvement of many mens wildom and circumspection, that they miscarried in the beginning of Affairs, who being admonished of their error, have often recompensed small · losses with larger success; and I doubt whether it ought not rather to be imputed to the Envy of Fortune then to any man's fault, that the constant felicity both of the Commonwealth, and our Family, is by a small detriment thus interrupted; though indeed it is rather to be accounted the good will then the envy of the Gods, by whose providence it is come to pass, that with this overthrow, not so fatal to the City as effectual to our instruction, we are put in mind of our humane condition, to abate that deadly pride which is usually the effect of excessive 'Prosperity. What soever the matter is Countrymen, I did certainly foresee some ill luck, when upon the Convention of the Senate, I did earneltly folicit you would not create my fon Conful. For when I confidered that my Father, Grandfather, Great-Grandfather, and other my Ancestors had frequently, and my felf five times born that Office, I began to miffruft whether the Gods for Men would willingly, and with an equal mind, fuffer the supreme Honour to continue in the 'fame Family. And I wish my prayers had then prevailed, or that you would be pleased still

2. Fabins without cause, or that without cause ye deprive him of it, if by a contrary Judgment ye shall destroy your former Sentence. But if you will please to decree things more favourably, both your own Authority, and the reputation of the Fabian Family shall yet stand found and his youthful folly, as it was committed with fome lofs to the Commonwealth, shall be amended to its greater emolument and profit. But who dares promite these things? Truly,

Countrymen, I will, even I will engage my felf to the Commonwealth for my fon, and happy may it prove to the Senate and People of Rome, and our own private Family, I will also go to make. My spirits are yet vigorous, neither, considering mine age, is the strength of my body

This sudden storme govern'd the Fortune of the whole Battel : The Roman Legions animated with the boldness of their Cavalrie, at first well received the Enemy, and straightway repell'd them : Herennius in vaine resisting, who, that day performing all the Offices both of a good General and a good Souldier, endeavouring to rally his files to retaine the Cowardly, and withfland the affailants, could neither hinder the Flight of his men, nor afterward find opportunity of escape for himself. Four thousand Samnites were taken with their General. The Battel and the flight swallowed up 24000. The Enemies Camp was likewise seized on with vast plunder in it, which was quickly much encreased by Forrage of their Grounds, and taking in of Towns both by florme and upon Mercy; This great change Eutrophias of Affaires was wrought by the access of one onely Person , infomuch that the lately Victorialib. 11. ous army is now routed by the Conquer'd party, and the Confull carries away captive that General by whom he was formerly himselfe shamefully beaten, which was a pleasing spectacle to the Romans, and a great Ornament to his Triumph, which by the ready good will of the People he made into the City the next yeare. While the Fabis thus order'd things in Samninm the other Confull D. Bruens (whose Province was among the Falifei) had the like happy success: Zenaras For being affifted by Sp. ness imposed on him by the Senate; the Romans upon this news feared lest by the discord of the Commanders, the Common-wealth would be damnified: Wherefore 'twas thought fit to fend Legates to the Conful, to desire in the Senates name that Fabius might be suffer'd to continue Dien apud Va. with the Army in Samnium. Posthumius having returned an absurd and broken Answer; added withall a speech of singular impudence: Thus during his Confulfit, he was not obliged to chey the Senate, but they him; and that his actions might correspond with his words, forthwith dismissing the Legates, he marcheth with his Army to Cominism, which City Fabin; did then besiege, resolving (if by no other means he could) by fight to remove his Rival: The Roman Armies had afforded the enemy a foul spectacle, if Fabius had refisted with the same he was affaulted; but he being better temper'd both by nature and his Fathers documents departed the Province, having profest that he yeilded not to the Confuls fury, but to the good of the Commonwealth. Posthumins in a few dayes reduced Cominium, whence leading his Army to Venusia, and taking that also, he carried about the War to other Towns; many whereof partly by force, partly by treaty were brought under his power. In this Expedition ten thousand of the enemies were flain, fix thousand two hundred casting down their arms, yeilding themselves to the mercy of the conquerours. The Confuls atchievements were no way contemptible, but the grace of them were spoiled by his pride and Insolence: Wherefore when he did by Letters advise the Fathers that the City and Territory of Venusia was very convenient for a Colony therein to be planted, the counsel indeed was accepted, but without mention made of the Author of the Victory and the counsels, other men had the conduct of the Colony of twenty thousand men; for fo I find it in Authors of no small credit: A great number indeed and almost exceed-Hermius fasyr, ing belief, but that it feems reasonable, that in the midft of Nations, yet unsubdued they should think of placeing a confiderable force, as a double guard both against the Apulians and the Lucanians. Now the stubborness of Posthumius, as besides other grudges and offences, it contraeted him much envy; so it tended much to encrease Fabins his Favour and good opinion with all men, fo, that when he came to the City, and had made relation of his performances, his triumph was readily affented unto. Being now Proconful he did on the Calends of Angulf make his triumph over those Samnites who are called Pentri: Old Fabins followed his Columna cipi-Chariot on horf-back, whom the people beheld, and by their acclamations acknowledged not on toline. upon the peoples Conful, using himself as the name, so the modelty of a Legate; beholding his Fabio Guadaner. fons honour with as much complacency, as when, being yet a little one, he did in his own triumph aum notion that a mach control of the plunder was by the Conful divided among the foul' Livie Epison it. diers, the rest laid up in the Treasury ; and C. Pontins the Samnite being first led in Triumph was afterward beheaded: A front man he was and of worthy memory, who in those dayes did a long time suffain the Roman violence, gave them many considerable overthrows, but of all the most shameful one at the Caudine Spinnies: He was reported to say, That had he been reserved to those dayer wherein the Romans should have learn't to receive money, he would no longer have suffired them to bear fway. It feems then the fortune of the City was not better defended by their industry in Arms, then their innocence of manners: In the mean time Posthumius fretting no less at the honour had been granted his Rival, then that the like had been denyed him, by weakness of mind opposing his own contumacy, to the authority of the Fathers, did both exasperate the wound of his own spirit, and imitate those imaginations against him, which ought by modefty of speech and carriage to have been asswaged. He abstained not from complaints against his enemies, nor from reproaches against the Senare, and to spite the Fathers, he destributed the whole prey among the fouldiers, and disbanded his army before a fucceffor could be fent him. whole prey among the tomaters, and unpanded his army perore a nucceitor comp be tent min.

Of the Taxes that year, there is no other memory left, but that two hundred seventy three thousand Citizens were rated. That this years Censors did likewise choose 2. Fabins Maximus Prince of the Senate, there is a likely conjecture, which is otherwise confirmed, for that honour did constantly remain in three of that Family successively; as for example, Maximus received it from Ambustus his father, and transmitted it to his son Gurges. While affairs were in a good state abroad, they were troubled with discord and sedition at home. The Comminalty being far in debt required a general discharge by publick authority for all debts and bonds passed aforetime, without any fatisfaction; this was an old divice, and for two hundred years and upwards variously agitated, even as any turbulent Tribune should exasperate them, or the Extortion of Usurers move their indignation. Under the former Confuls, the fear either of the Pestilence or the Enemy did smother these contentions in some measure; but Q. Marcius Tremulus and P. Cornelius Arvina being Confuls, and the year enfuing M. Claudius Marcellus, and Foundation of C. Nantius Rutilus bearing office, they broke out most violently, for the appealing whereof, more then for any other occasion, a Dictator was created, whom I take to be Appins Claudius, who was afterwards firnamed Casus, in as much as among ancient monuments I find him to have been Dictator.

Befides the harfanes of unconfcionable usury, the villanous lust of C. Plotius added fire to apud Onephrium the peoples minds now already hotly disposed, causing them the sooner and more vehemently to break out into flame. T. Veturius (the fon of that Veturius who being Conful was delives red up to the Samnites for an unworthy League made with them) by reason of his domestick calamities, overcharged with debt and not able to pay, was forced to yield himself slave to Plo-Dion. apud Va- tins, patiently performing all fervile duties. Plotius not content to have reduced to this base condition a young man of excellent Beauty, of a Confular Family, and likewise of great hopes, did moreover attempt to corrupt his Chastity, having before deprived him both of Estate and

But Veturius disdaining and resolveing to suffer any thing rather then commit so horrida wickedness, was with most grievous stripes tormented, whereupon he thrust himself forth into the publick, and being by the multitude conducted to the Consul's Tribunal, he complains of the cruelty and lust of his Creditor, shewing withal the bunches and fresh marks of the lashes. The Confuls therefore judging it a bufiness not to be neglected, informed the Senate thereof, where upon sentence past, Ploisus was condemned to prison, and by a Law in that case established, All men whosoever through the whole City had bound themselves slaves for debt, were set at liberty. I am not ignorant that instead of T. Veturius some Authors make mention of Publius the fon of a Colonel, who was one of the contrivers of the Caudine peace. Forty years before this, for the like cause, was a Law made for the annulling such Indentures; nevertheless the

Usurers growing to hard hearted, and the former Law, by the patience of Debtors (refuling nothing in the midit of their penurie) being by degrees neglected, 'twas though fit they should be admonished by so fresh an example to provide more full and diligent caution for the future. But the people desiring to be freed not only from their Indentures, but from the Extortion of Use mony, were not satisfied with that Law though favourable to their revengeful minds. And (as in some more accute diseases, the pain is rather intended by a gentle application of medecines then remitted) not long after the matter was so Exulcerated, that when the Tribunes of the people with their greatest endeavours contended for a Law concerning Letters of Protection from Creditors, and that the Creditors did with equal force and animolity relift: The Commonalty after the example of their Ancestors, quitting the City, retired cross the water to Mount Janiculus, resolving never, without obtaining their request, to return to their own houshold Gods. The Confuls finding little remedy against this combustion (M. Valerius Potitus, and C. Ælius Patwo are thought then to be Confuls) they were fain to flie to the last refuge in diffressed times, and create a Dictator, who was 2. Hortensins, he applying what the Time and the Cause seemed to require, and understanding the main breach of peace to confist in this, That the people were sensible of the violation of their Decrees, and the Publishan Law, thought fit to yield to the times, (though many strove against this opinion) and by a new Law made in the Esculete he diligently provided, That what foever the Commonalty should ordain, all the Romans should Agailina 15, 27 be obliged unto. For hitherto it had prevailed that no man executed any magistracy by the peoples votes , Gicero pro Pla.

The Improvident vulgar did for some time contain themselves within their former bounds, and though they feldom contradicted the Fathers Sentences, yet they were alwayes feared as having power to do fo. N. is faid to have been Mafter of his horse, For there was war at this time with Livie Epit, 12 the Volinians of the Esruscan Nation, which was very seasonable to clear Rome of the seditions, and those who retained the spirit of the sormer Discord. There was likewise occasion found of waging war with the Lucamans, who being troublefome neighbours, had by many injuries compelled the Thurines (a City of that part of fally called Great Grees) to betake themfelves to the Roman Protection: And C. Elius the Tribune propounding a War against the Luca-Plinie 34.6 nians, the people decreed it. The armies therefore were drawn into the field, and in each place things performed, the memories whereof, with the Annals of those who wrote them, is perished. The Thurines bestowed on C. Ælim a statue and Crown of gold. Next follows the Consulfhip of C. Claudius Canina, and M. Amilius Lepidus, whereof no memorable thing is delivered to posterity; only the Etruscan and Lucanian war seem to have been still in being. There is also on Record an Oration of Curius concerning the Lucanians, which is to be Authorities to be referred to one of his four Triumphs, for so often I find he Triumphed. But things of greater weight were now ingendring, which were attended with a very confiderable slaughter, for a war was now arisen against the Senones a people of Gallia. They had often ware and often peace with the Romans; and now, after their last overthrow in the fields Palph. 2 of Sentinal, where, Decisa haveing Devoted himselse to Death, a great Number of their Livie 10.2) men were flaine, had lien ftill for almost ten yeares; Onely they had luffer'd their young men to be hired by the Etruscans against the Romans. But now marching into Etrusia, with a Patible. to be intend by the factorians against the Romans, but now marking into firm in, with a representation of the Rectine bad untilly done, they Besteged Arctimes. Now the Arctines had be. Live 10.37 fore this requested a league with the Romans, which beeing denied they did neverthelesse obtaine a Truce, whose Terme was not yet expired. But herein did their chiefest Hope of succour conflit, because the Romans alwayes thought it mainely concernd them to have the Gaules beaten. Wherefore fending Embassadours to Rome they craved affishance against the common enemy. In the mean time the yeare was gone about wherein C. Servitus Tuca and Lucius Cacilius Metel-Agno 469. Cornelius Dolabella, and Cn. Domitius Calvinus being Confuls, when the Terrour of the Gallique warre began again to move it selfe, and news was brought that many of the Tuscans had joyned forces with the Senones, the Fathers thought the Danger of the Aretines a thing not to be neglected by them : And because they could neither recall Dolabella from the Volfinians, nor Domitius out of Lucania without great hindrance to their affaires, The Fathers ordain L. fortune in his fight before the Town with the Senones and Etrurians, seven Colonells with many other men of Note, together with the Prater himself were flain, and of their Legions and Auxilliaries about Thirteen Thousand were wanting. But the Joy for this victory prevailed not fo much with the Gaules, as forrow and Conflernation for the Lamentable Defolation of their Country, Wherefore gathering together all their Country men then in Armes in Etruria, full of Grief and Anger, void of counfell and hope; having no habitation whereto to be received at home, (I know not what Fate drawing them to their destruction) in a heat of Resolution they drive toward Rome, thus Computing, That there is no other way to recompence the defolation of their own Countrey, but by forcing the Romans to see the like Ruine of their City. That their Spirits and Forces were now no whit is feriour to, nor the cause of their March from Aretium of less importance, then that of their Ancestours who marched from Clusium of the Same Etruria and took Rome: With the like fpeeches incenting themselves they Rush on, by nature impatient of Delay, and now hasty in their Counsels, that they might overwhelme their Enemies unawares; But travelling through an Enemies Countrey, they met with many obstacles, so that the Romans had Leifure to provide against this Fury. At length wandring through unknown and unfriendly places, guided by no certaine Line, they light upon Domitius the Confull, and immediately joyne Battell with him; But their unhappy rashness confounded both their Reason and Discipline: many being slaine in Battel, the Relidue growing mad with Rage and despaire sheathed in their own Bowells, those weapons they had in vain drawn against the Enemy. Insomuch as so sudden and vehement a Judgement overtook a late most flourishing People for their villany in murthering Embassadours, that in the space of sew months they were totally cut off, and ceased any more to be numbred among Nations, whose laws they had violated and Transgessed: For even the small Remnant of the Senones who had betaken themselves to their Neighbours, and Kinsmen the Boii, were the next year by Dolabella the Confull with an universal flaughter clean swept away. Florer, 1, 13. For whereas the Boians and Etrurians were involved in these late disasters, and possessed with feat of the same Calamities, they were at the Lake called Vadimonis in a set Battell overcome, many of the Etrurians slain, few of the Boians cleaped, the very name of the Senones so utterly extinct, little figne that ever that Countrey had been inhabited by Mankind. Britomaris himselfe being

that there is not thought to be left alive one Man of that Nation which had fet Rome on fire. About this time I think it more probable that the Colony was planted in Sena, the Romans Polybins having now an entire possession of their Countrey, and quite taken away their Name out of that part of Italy. Nevertheless the Etrurians and the Boians next year recruiting their army Plinie. with young men now grown up, ventred once more to try the Fortune of a Battell. Then it Polybius. was I believe by Q. Anilius Papus that they were beaten, for his and C. Fabricius his first 471. Consulship hapned that year, and 'tis certain the Province of Etruria fell to Papus by Lot. But in most Annalls yet extant, the Memory of these Transactions is swallowed up by the Inter-Dionys. apud vening of greater matters. For whereas the Romans had by fo many continual fights and Fulvinum trifvictories very mightily encreased their Virtue and Power, all the free Cities and Nations in Italy being brought into feare, confipred in a great and most dangerous warre; joyning together all their Connfells and forces as againft a Common Enemy, and Plunderer. Neither thought they fit any longer to deferre their Deligne, while now the Remnant of the Boians and Etrurians sufficed to distract the Roman Powers. And first of all the Samnites, again breaking their League and openly joyning force with the Lucanians and Brutians, commenced the Warre. But these were overcome by C. Fabricias in many pitch'd fields; especially in one most remarkable Plinie, 24.7 when they joyn'd battell neer the City of the Thurines, which Statius Statilius had again Val. It is reported that while the camp was strenuously defended, A young man of large proportion of Body was feen to bring Ladders to the works, whereby the Romans being animated obtained a complete victory. Twenty Thousand are said to be slain in Annianus the fight and in the Camp, Five thousand together with the General taken Prisoners, and twen-Marcellius ty Colours. The Tarentines had not as yet affifted the Accomplices with any open aid; for though they were the Principal Authors of the Confederacy, yet they thought it wifer to let the Roman forces be provoked and the Fortune of warre tried with other men's danger then their own. But this Diffimulation served not their purpose, for a meer accident provoking the Rarshnels of the Giddy rabble betrayed all their Counsels. Even at this Time, that part of the Italian shore, after the Manner of the Gracians (by whom Tarentus and most of the other Cities were builded) did exceffively delight themselves with sights, and stage playes: The Tarentines above others were most Luxurious in this kind, insomuch as it is said they had Strabo.6. more Feafts and Solemn Playes then Dayes in the Yeare. Posthumine lifting up his woice, We accept this, O men, Office (faith be) feeing ge bestom shofe things upon us we required not at your hands. And when he corned himself to the multirude thewing his defiled garment, they renew dtheir laughter, and began to dance, finging fourtilous and reproachful Verles against the people of Rome, wherefore Foftumius again crying out, Laugh on, faith he, laugh on, Tarentines, while ye may, for hereafter ye shall weep sufficiently: Whereat the Taxentines being nettled, Nay, faith he, to vex youthe more. I tell you before hand, this garment shall cost you much blood the mashing. After this, receiving no other answer, they sailed home. Now at Rome, L. Emilius Barbula, and Q. Marcius Philippus, had begun their Confulthip, by whom the Senate being convened, and the Robedefiled, as it was, being show'd by the Embassadors, who declared to the Fathers the whole series of affronts and indignities heaped on them by the Tarentines: Their spirits were in an high manmer incented, and not so much as any scruple made of vindicating their reproach by Arms. But because they had already to deal with somerry mighty Nations, they could not resolve whether now immediately, or hereafter to lend an Army against the Tarentines, and the debate continued many dayes even from morning till night: Some were of opinion, That nothing foodld be enterprized before the other Cities, at least these mear Tarentus were reduced; Others contended. That the war should incontinently be commenced; at last, numbring their votes, it was decreed That the business of the Tarentine war should be referr'd to the people. The people with an ananimous confent agreed upon the War, and accordingly letters were lent to Amilias the Could, who was then gene to the Army into Samaium, That omitting all things at profest, he found pitch his Camp on the Tarentine Fields, and, unless he could procure fatisfaction for the injuries received, that he fould profecute them with a just and holy War. The Tarentines perceiving they had now no longer to deal with a few unsamed men, but a just and well order d Army, rouzing themselves out of their accustom'd lost those, began leti-onsly to enter into counsel, what was to be done; to accept of the war was dangerous, to do what the Romans required in fatisfaction was bale, and to avoide both impossible: While their Opinions were thus doubtful, one among the rest flood up and faid, "Why do we thus, O Tarentimes, wast the time in vain altercations? the times are come which require Deess rather then Words, which that they may be ordered to the publick benefit, there is need of free Speech and fincere Counfel. Neither am I much moved that heretofore, by a drange dileste incident to Free Cities, ye have been delighted with flattering and fingar'd Orations, though of ill consequence, because then, as in time of Prosperity, ye regarded not much what mainly tended to the good of the Commonwealth: But now the Roman Army is upon our Borders, and the fear of the enemy before our Gates, and this is fufficient to milrust us to prefer what is Proditable before what is Pleating. Neither would I have you to interpret me, as if I flood up to hit you in the teeth with past mildemeenors; for unleadonably to object old crimes is the part of an enemy, and one who wantonly infults over others infumities: And an honell man that is careful of the common lafety, will hide and excule the faults of his City, unliffe the remembrance of them be of concernment to the avoiding forme publick Calamity. For feeing we are but men, to pretend freedom from alierror, would argue 200 much Pride: But often to "fall at the fame frone, and not to grow wifer when the very event plainly chaffilest our rathnels, is not confident with right reason. We have atone man's warning affinited and drown'd the Roman thips, and prefently with open war vexed our Kinfmen the immines because they had rather be protested by the Romans, then farallowed up by the Incarian and Brutians; "moreover, we have fuffered thameful intignities to be cast on the Roman Secta Midors; fo that a war we might have avoided, a heavy dangerous war we are not provided for, bath in a most unlucky time overtaken us. Finally, the Roman Camps are now into the countields, and "and we as yet wavering in our counted, deliberate All whether at he later to succept a formidable war, or make a dishanourable peace. And I would no God at length, that suping adde all left flatery, and forgetting self-interest, and aiming at the publick bearest and profit, we "might steely and early confait together, abore might certainly a way be found of making an "honofileague, or a fale war. But now tiles you chearly divided into two parts, I may by fadisant, notabling counted out of judgment or softe trace of things require, but every man by affed by his own inclination. For how comes it to pass that so few of the young men, and poorer fort fland for peace? and why do none of the rich and ancient men delire war? what Zonnas other reason can be given of so equal a division in the City, but these that would fain in quiet reap the commodity of their Lands and Ulury, the other in time of war, hope for command and biberty of plunder? This is an old difease amongst us, neither of a long time hath our Commonwealth wanted such men, who even with the danger and detriment of the City have flu- Diedorus died to increase their own private wealth. All which may happily be prevented (for I must foeak what I think at present most conducible) if ye will neither buy peace on such base conditions as shall infringe the priviledges of a Free City, nor yet trust fingly to your own Forces in fo difficult a war. Our Ancestors have often committed the conduct and command of their Aprim * Armies to forreign Leaders: Either out of Peloponnesus or out of Sicilie we have sent for Strab, book 6 Archidamus the fon of Agefilaus, afterward for Cleonymus, then prefently for Agathecies. Even in our own memory when we were infelted by our Neighbours, our Fathers made use of · Alexander the Epirot: By which means they did not only themselves succeed prosperously, Liv. 8. 14 but left things in a flourishing condition to u. There is at this day the same friendship between sus and the Epirots, neither are they now leffe potent in an Army and a Commander: And the benefit is fresh in memory, which Pyrrbus received from us, in that with our whole Navy we affilted him in his attempt against the Corcyreans. Therefore esteem this not as my counsel. Paulan, book & but as the counsel of the wifet men who have heretofore happily governed this Commonwealth, which ye ought therefore at least to follow, because in the former example you may discern both the reason and ground, as also the issue and successe of it. And yet otherwise, there may be arguments most evident and sufficient to the same purpose: There is no man amongst us so fingularly eminent, to whom all the rest will willingly submit themselves, and what danger there is in emulation, when we have to do with a fierce and potent Enemy, ye are not ignorant. And who foever ye shall make General, either by his too great affection to peace, or by his ambition of carrying on the war, may wrong your affairs; not to fay, that tis not fafe to commit a war into the hands of any ordinary person against the Romans, an hardy stout Nation and inur'd to Arms. But the truth is, which none can doubt of, that Pyrrbus is not by any man exceeded in virtue and experience of Mashal affairs. But perhaps he will not come? Plutareb. in Certainly, being a man desirous of action, and having no other war at present, he will not only Pyrrhe 6.25 come himself, but bring a formidable strength, and that of no fresh-water souldiers. And if ve fear his encreachment upon your Liberties, ye may treat with him on fuch conditions as the Commonwealth may be secur'd. By this means ye may either obtain an honourable peace. or bestow a glorious one. Though indeed it be not the least of my hopes, that the Romans will rather beforehand deal with us on equal terms then admit of Pyrrhus into Italy, having heretofore feared a King of much leffe glory and renown out of the same Epirus. This counsel prevailed not only fo far, as to make them fee a probable way opened to the publick fafety, but likewise the assembly being divided into two contrary opinions, neither part being able to prevail over the other, they did all unanimously concur in this, as seeming indifferent to both

'Tis reported, when the Rumour was spread about the Citie, that a decree was made for plutareb. the invitation of Pyrrhus that one Meson a covereous fellow taking a dry wither'd chapplet upon Pyrrho. 4.26. his head, after the manner of Drunkards, together with his minstrel, entred the Theatre; the people according to their idle custome, commanded him to fing and his woman to pipe, after a while filence being made, Meton crys out, Te doe well , O Tarentines, in that ye grant Liberty to them that please, to sing and Dance; for when Pyrthus once comes into the Citie we fall scarce be allowed to live after our owne minds. The People being somewhat moved at this faying, and murmurings and whifperings arifeing; Those who were authors of the injuries against the Romans (fearing lest if peacefull Counsels prevailed they should be delivered up to punishment) having chid the people, That they would inffer themselves tobe unworthily derided by a rafo fellow, forcibly thrust Meton out of the Theatre, fo that afterward without contradiction the Decree was ratified. But the Roman Conful, hearing nothing from the Tarentines Zonares tending to peace, and understanding that Embassadours were sent with presents to Pyrrhus, Orefine 4. E fets himself to the War, wasteth their grounds, taketh their Cities some by sorce, some by composition, and fills all places with losse, and terrour. The Tarentines send forth forces Zonaras to hinder the spoile, but, after a sharpe conflict, the Romans having the better, the Græcians are droven backe into the Citie with great loffe. Then Emilius without resiltance walteth and burneth the whole Country round about. The Tarentines terrified with these calamities. (like a people, the more infolent in prosperity, the more dejected and searefull in adversity) submit themselves to the Government of Agis, who was a constant authour of maintaining the Roman friendship. Their desire and hopes of peace were much augmented by the discourse of fome prime men who were dismissed by the Consult, and declared his Humanity, With what Indulgence and candour be entertain'd those who were taken in severall places of the Countrie, or in the last fight. But the confidence of Cineas who was now come with Auxiliaries from Epirus changed their minds, and erected their spirits. For Pyrrhu being a man of vast conceits, and in emulation of Alexander the Great, comprehending large Empires in his fancy, believed now a way to be laid open to accomplish all his designes, as if the Fates themselves had invited him.

'Tis faid he was much confirm'd by the Oracle of Delphos, whose words were indeed of an am-Aug.de.Civ. biguous fense, which yet the Kings ambition did favourably interpret. For consulting about the War he was now to undertake, Answer was made, Poffe eum Romanos vincere, that he should Environment of overcome the Romans, or the Romans him. But I think his chiefe encouragment was from the Envisional Co. Tarencine Embsfadour who affirm'd, That out of their own Cities, with the kelp of the Lucanians, the Mifapians, Summies and other the confederats, they could easily raise twenty thousand horse and three hundred and fifey thousand foot. With this strength, when he should once have brought the Romans under subjection, he hoped with little paines to attaine the Lordship of all Justin. ∙8 1 Healy, then a thort cut into Sicilie would prefent him with an Island much at discord and void of 8 Ruler (the families of Agathocles being destroyed) and this he thought he might claime by right of Inheritance, as having begotten Children on Lanaffa the daughter of Agathocles; these things happily succeeding he was resolved to make War with the Carthaginians. Tis reported that Giaeai, a man of excellent wildome, willing to have the King by his own confession acknowledg that his immoderate delires, whereby the enjoyment of his present felicity was desturbed . were in reason to be restrained, asked him, What he would doe when he had overcome the Romans? Pyrrhiu then declaring how one victorie would beget another, And what shall we doe, faies he, when all these things are accomplished? Why then, faith Pyrrheu, we will enjoy the fruits of Peace, the benefic of ease and Idlenesse. To which Cineas replied, And why, O King, can we not at present enjoy the same things, while they are in our hands? whereas the undertakeing of new Wars may utterly deprive m of them. But a second embassly comeing from the Tarentines . Pyrrhus overcome by his own ambition, answer'd, That 'twas the custome of the Epirots #ustinius. Diolori Eclog. to wage war, not only for themselves, but for their companions and friends also. But to diffembook 22 ble his more fecret counsells, he articles very presisely with the Embassadours, That allowne as Zonaras he had reliev'd them, he should be suffer'd to returne home; and not be detain'd in Italy any longer Paufau.Bo. 1 then necessity should require. Then with all might and maine intending himselse upon p eparation for the War, he causeth a great number of long ships to be made ready, and likewise Zonaras. trims up others for transportation of men and horse. Now having Employed most of the Italia Pluarch an Embassadors (whom under a pretext of honour he detain'd as hostages and pledges) in levying and conducting of forces; he tent the rest beforehand to Tarentum, with three thousand armed men, and Gineas for Commander. By their arrival all hopes of peace were broken off. Zonayas Agis his government abrogated, and by decree of the people the guidance of affairs committed to one of them who were now returned from Epirus. Not long after Milo being fent by the King, secures the Tower of Tarentus with a Garrison, and claims the custody and defence of the walls, with the very good will of the multitude, who were glad to fee strangers undertake all the trouble and labour, while they fafely enjoy'd their rest; they therefore chearfully decree Corn for the fouldiers and Mony for Pyrrhus. In the mean time L. Amilius understanding of the Arrivall of these beyond-sea souldiers, Frontian 1,4 that he might have the fafer winter quarters, resolv'd to draw his army into Lucania. His journey was by certain narrow passages shut in on the one hand with the Sea, on the other with ragged and impassible Rocks. The Tarentines having intelligence of his purpose, sail dby that shore with their ships furnished with Cross-bows and Slings, assaulting the fouldiers as they pasfed through strait and open paths with stones and darts. But Amilius, not being able to help Zonaras. himself by virtue, secur'd his passage by cunning; the Captives which before he had placed in the Rear, he now draws to that fide of the ranks which was obnoxious to danger, in pity of whom, the Tarentines fearing to hurt their own men, spared also the enemy. These things were done at Tarentus this year. At Rome C. Fabricius Luscinus, who in his Consulfhip had egregiously overcame the Samnites, and Lucanians entred the Capital in Triumph. 2. Marcins Catitolina not many daies after obtained the fame honour, being returned out of Erraria with prosperous fragmenta fuccess. The reason why, the Etrurian war not as yet being finished, he was called out of his Province at such a time of year (for Fabricius triumph'd the third of the Nones of March) is not recorded. I conceive he was recall'd by the Senate, who being troubled with expectation of Pyrchus, did from every quarter gather together what strength they could. The Pro-Aug de Civ. D...3.17 letarii, the fixth and last rank of Citizens, who of old were priviledged from going to war, were now lifted, and being not able by reason of their poverty to provide themselves with arms, they Orofiza 4:1 were furnished by the publick, for at this time war being on every side commenced, it was neceffary the Commonwealth should be defended by many Armies. These mens office was while the Legions were otherwise imployed, to guard the City with watch and ward, being disposed in several stations upon the walls, and in the Market-place. Neither by all these contrivances Agoinm 1640 could the Imminent calamities have been averted, but that the fortune of a City ordained to Rule did in these most dangerous times produce men of so great Excellency, as I know not whether ever the could boatt of better: Men, not so eminent for their R ches or Extraction, as truly ennobled by their Virtue and contempt of wealth. This Age had its Curis, Fubricis, Corunciani, men of no great Ancestors or Possessions, but of most ample fame, which they obtained by their upright example, exact skill in Marshal affairs, and an answerable innocence of Manners;

who were every where helpful to their Country, which had now need of Champions, which were able not only to refift the fword of the enemy, but to fcorn his gold, having to deal with a

with two and twenty Thousand foot, three thousand horse, twenty Elephants, and a confiderable band of flingers and archers, was in the midft of his Voyage fo toffed with a Tempest, that he narrowly escaped being cast away. For the Navy being dispersed, and most of the frips distressed, when the Admirall was in danger, Pyrhus leapt into the sea, and with very great paines at length hardly swam to shoare: But the strength and spirit of his minde did much helpe the weakness of his Body, together with the dilgence of the Messapians, on whose shoare he was cast, who with all offices of humanity did foment and cherish him : with their affisturce likewife, some few ships, which had cscaped the violence of the storme, being brought into the Haven, there were gathered together fome few horse, with two Elephants, and under two thousand footmen, with this force he marched to Tarentus, being met by Cineas who came forth with his fouldiers to conduct him thither, and being entertained with much joy he took his rest for some dayes; In which space having observed the Manners of the City to be so order'd, that unless they were amended, there was no possibility of protecting it, but that rather the Patrons themselves would likewise be undone by it, he took no open notice at the present. But a while after, his dispersed ships meeting together, when he had strength sufficient, he shut up their wressing places, and Porches, where the idle youth use to spend whole dayes in walking and fooling, he forbad their Banquets and Drinking matches, and reduced their folemn Games from Intemperancy to a just Mediocrity.

After this he made a very ftrick Leavy of their young men, commanding his Pressers to choose Fronting out those of the larger fize, he would make them valiant; Mixing these among his own Com- strat. 4.1. panies left being apart they should prove seditious, he traines them up with the same hardness Zonaras and severity of Discipline, threatning pain of Death on those who should fly from their Colours. Those who were not in armes he compell'd to be most part of the day in the Market-place ; by Plutarch which strange usige the Citizens borne and bred up in shameful Luxury were grievously perplex. Zonaras ed, calling it a flavery to be thus ferved against their wills, choosing rather to perish with idlenefs and Luft. The offence was aggravated by the Infolence of some of the King's Guard who Plutireh chooling Quarters at their own pleafure, possessed them against the will of their Landlords, Appear apid using much license towards their Wives and Children. Wherefore many being wearied our, Valesium. for look the City, and fettled themselves in the Country, till at length that likewise was forbidden, the Ports being shut, and guards appointed. Then indeed the Tarentines perceiv'd that in Zoneras flead of a Companion they had got a Mafter, and what onely Comfort was left them, when they had any handsom occasion of meeting, they bewailed their Condition with indignation and Complaints, and that more freely, when befides their other Paffion, they were heated with Wine; There wanted not those who informed Pyrebus of this, and some of them being sent for, were Val. Meximus. accul'd for having spoken dishonourably of their King at their Banquets; But one Man's 5.1.3. Ext. simple and ingenuous Confession freed them all from Punishment, for faires he, We faid these words Zonaras indeed, and should have faid worse but that we wanted Wine; whereat Pyrrbus smiling, dismist them, being willing the fault should be imputed to the wine rather then to the men ; But not Plutareb in confiding either in the Mindes or manners of the City, what men he observed to be of greatest Pyrroe. G.16. Note for Authority or Counsell amongst them, he either found or made some Cause arise to Zonaras fend them to his Son Prolomy (who being then fifteen yeares of Age he had left Viceroy in his gustine 12. 1. Realme) others by fecret Ambush he cut off, and some to make them suspected to the People, he Zonaras did with much feeming humanity embrace, as if he held them among his dearest Friends. Of this number was Ariftarchus a principal Man much beloved of the Citizens, and of great repute for his Eloquence, Pyrrhus perceiving him to be very Popular, upon a certain emergent Occasion commands him to saile into Epirus. Aristarchus (knowing it was present Death to disobey the King; and that to obey him was, though not of so sudden, yet of as certain ill Consequence) taking ship, after he had sailed a little way, steer'd his course to Rome, where being received into credit, he inform'd the Senare of many Affaires of great Concernment: While Pyrrbus thus builed himselfe at Tarentus, the Romans were no less careful in making Leavys for the warre, they had raifed Money, and fent Fabricius to their Confederate Cities, either by his Authority or Grace to restrain them from Innovation in State; Those who were most sufpected were kept in awe by Garrisons conveniently placed amongst them. For the strength of Dio. so many Nations combining themselves against one Commonwealth, and their expectation of fo Warlike a King, had very much moved the humours of the Italians who were either desirous Zonaras. of Change, or provoked with the perswasion of Injuries received; which made the Romans Zonaras the more diligent to provide for their own fafety by a timely suppressing all Occasions of sedition. About this Time an Accident befell the Pranestine Nobles very remarkable, for they being brought to Rome late in the Evening were for Custody's sake lock't up in the Publick Treafury, whereby at length they understood the Deceit of an Oracle, which they did make use of to flirre up their Countrymen to Rebellion, often averring, it was Decree'd by the Fates, That the Roman Treasury should be possessed by the Pranestines. The Fathers being already much perplexed, had further Intelligence that Fabricius was detained by their Confederate and Companions as a Pledge to secure the safe return of their hostages from Rome, and that Embassadours Dion. apud were fent to incite the Etrurians, the Umbres and the Gaules against the People of Rome , whereat they were infinitely troubled as at a fact in it felfe horrid, so of ill Example, lest in such a Dangerous time the Roman faith and honesty should be call'd in question, and held suspected by feizing upon the City. The delign was favour'd by occasion of the present warre, which so wholly took up the Romans that they had no Leifure to mind the affaires of Rhegium; Befides on the opposite shore were the Mamertines, an Example of the like successfull villany, and ready no doubt to defend the like Treachery in others, especially being tyed with the Relation of the Pelybius. fame Common Country; For they likewise were of Campania, and of late yeares going to Dissorticustry awarre amongst the Auxiliaries of Agathocles, and being entertained by the Messenias as ex. lib. 21.

Friends, having slain and cast out the Citizens, possessing the place themselves: sharing likewise among themselves their houses, wives and Estates. They called to mind also the Campanians of old, who by the like wicked art got Capus from the Tulcans. When they had now agreed upon the Bulinels, there was nothing left to be confulted on, but only the Manner, how fafely to execute their Defign, left in so populus a Citie, the lesser number should be surrounded and slain by the greater. Dicius counterseiteth Letters as wrote from the Rhegians to Pyrrbus, to betray the Roman Garrison to him; these Letters as if they were intercepted, are read to the souldiers in private Decisis bitterly complaining of the Perfidiousness of the Rhegians; and some soudiers being subborned to it, cry out, "Twas time to provide for their own safety by the sword, and turn that Destruction which was destined to them, upon the heads of the Authors; and as the bufinels was fet, a Mellenger comes in with newes, That Pyrrhus his Navy was feen by the shore, and secret discourses were had bet ween him and the Rhegians. The fouldiers now beside their former Covetoninels, were much incensed with the Treachery of the Enemy, and sear of Danger; It is therefore by Common Confent refolv'd upon, Th at the Townefmen shall be oppressed unawares and unprepard, that having flain the Men, all the Publick and Private wealth of the City shall be distributed to the Legion. Behold now an unworthy and horrid fact; Decins having invited fome of the Prime men to Supper, against the holy Rites of Hospitality, takes away their Lives others were every where flain in their own houses; the greater part of the Rhegians being thus murthered, the rest were banished their Country, even by those whom of late they had entertain'd under the Name of Friends and Companions, for preservation of themselves and their Countrey. Execution being done, there is now a new face of Publick affaires; the houses and Effates of the poore wretches like the Plunder of an Enemy, is divided amongst the Thieves; and while the Blood is yet fresh and warme, the Matrons and Virgins are forced to Marry the murtherers of their husbands and Parents; and the Cruel Perfidious Legion arrogates to it selse the Title and Rights of the City of Rhegium: But it hath pleafed God well to provide for Mankinde, that such rare examples of high Mischiefe should prove likewise as manifel Examples of Vengeance and Divine Justice; Lest we should onely by consideration of the success be animated to the like Villany, and not by the Issue and event be deterr'd from evil doing, so that no true Felicity attends the Wicked, neither can there be a greater Madness then for any man to perswade himself that he can grow happy by doing Mischief : For suppose there were no Punishment after Death, which all wife men acknowledg to be the greatest, (for the folly of ordinary men is so great they will scarce believe what is before their eyes, much less be moved with the terrour of things unfeen and afarre off,) yet let all things as to outward shew succeed prosperously, nevertheless the Conscience of offences committed doth by secret wounds continually lacerate and torment the minde: the Name of the Living, and the memory of the Dead is had in perpetual hatred and Detellation among men: and what is by ill meanes gotten, and all the Italians. In the utmost part of the Italian shoare over against Sicilie is seated

all the Italians, In the united part of the Italians, the City of Rhegium, (by a Gracian name fo called) very wealthy and flourithing in those dayes: The Citrzens thereof judging by the Arrival of Pyrrhus that a great and terrible warre would ensu; and frighted likewise with the Carshaginian Navy floating up and down in those seas, not trusting in their own strength, thought fit to fend for a Guard from Rome. The Romans fent them Four thousand souldiers (which being leavied out of the Colonies of Campania, were call'd the Campanian Legion) under the Conduct of Dicins Jubellins their Colonel . These at their first coming were very faithfull, and very diligent in defending the City. At length feeing no warre approach neer them, and being by degrees debauch'd with idleness and imitation of the Greek Customes, they began to compare the Advantage they had now in their hands with the hard and laborious life they had hitherto led; and with much

venient scituation of the City, and the happiness of the Inhabitants. Decius was well pleased with this, who being himfelf grown as Licentious, had long ago conceived an inward defire of destruction after great variety of troublesome Chances, was deferred to the Tenth year, as shall in fit time be declared. These Rascalls did not long enjoy Comfort or Tranquility amongst themselves; The seare of the Romans and Pyribus they did indeed avoid, as by reason of the present Conjuncture of Affaires, so by holding strict society with the Mamertines, and resolving to Offend neither Party: For 'twas thought fafelt in their first beginnings to abstain from warre at the present, while their New City which had so violent and sudden an Original, should have time to itrengthen, compact and knit it felfe well together: they faw that without Danger they could not molest the King, and were in hopes the more readily to obtain Pardon from with care and labour preserved is most commonly to their great grief snach't away again, neither God nor men suffering Wickedness to go long unpunished It will not be amis briefly to relate the the Romans, if they bore not arms against them. The first cause of diffension, as is usual among Vel. Meximus Thieves, arose from an unequal division of the Plunder. Decise in the sedition was call out and betook himself to Messana, the Souldiers at Rhegium chose M. Casius his Secretary for their Diodorns Commander, and Decim carrying with him a great bank of mony, was honour'd with the fame dignity by the Mamertines, though his fortune was neither profeerous nor of continuance. For it hapned, that being troubled with fore eyes, he caused some Eminent Physician to be fought out for him; the Divine Vengeance hereby overtaking the wicked man with most sharp and bitter punishments: A Physician was therefore brought unto him, who prov'd to be by birth a Rhegian, but because he had lived so long at Messana, his original was not only unknown to Decim, (who would never have trusted himself to the mercy of a Rhegian) but likewise to most of the inhabitants of the City.

He being mindfull of his Country and refolving now to be revenged for its Calamites . perswaded Decime that the remedie he brought, was indeed strong in Operation, but of quick and most certaine efficacy: So applying the medicine which he had temper'd with the Juice of Can- Diedorsol tharides, and giveing order it should not be removed till he returned to the Patient, without delay he taketh ship, and flyeth from Messana. Decises being along time sufficiently tormented Appian with incredible paines, feeing his Physician came nog at him commanded the Medicament to be removed, which being washed off, he perceived himself to be starke blind. So that being now a blind Exul, infamous and dispiled, he is referved to judgement, as if he were bound in Chaines by a wonderfull Method of Divine Vengeance, in that he received this Plague from one to whom he had trufted his health, even as he himfelfe had by Cruelty and treachery circumvented those whom he ought to have protected. Tis fit such Examples as these should be recorded in History and transmitted to posterity, for the Benefit of mankind which is never sufficiently convinced how farre these Cunning practises are different from wildome and right reason; so that neglecting the Rules of Virtue, Honefly, and Fidelity, they doe for love of falle and onely feeming good things by foul and villanous lufts involve themselves in true Evilla.

BOOK III.

O W at Rome, part of their forces being kept at home for guard of the City, and for a referve against the uncertain chances of war, the Armies and Provinces were committed to the charge of the new Confuls. P. Laverius Lavinus was deligned against the Tarentines and Pyrrhus, and Zonares Ts. Coruncianus fent to finish the Errurian War. Lavinus, thinking it would much avail as to his own reputation, fo to the Terror of the enemies to provoke them first; and that it was profitable to the Commonwealth, to avert the fear and inconveniences of War, as far as might be, from the Roman Territories; leading his Army into Lucania, did there fortifie a Castle in a convenient place, furnishing it with a strong Garrison, both to retard the proceedings of Pyrrbus, and to keep the Lucanians in awe, whose treathery was feared, left they should dare to revolt to the enemy. Pyrrhus having intelligence of the Roman Conful's approach, though his forces were not yet affembled together, judging it both dishonourable and hurtful now in the beginning of the War to manifest any token of Fear, with what strength he had at present, did forthwith march out to meet him. But that he might find some colourable pretence to draw out the bulinels and gain time, he fent a Mellenger with Letters of thefe Contents: Pyrrhus the King mifbeth Health to Lavinus, I underft and that thou are come forth with thine army against the Tarentines, but leaving it for a while, come thou unto me with asmall Retinue, and I, taking cognizance of the quarrel, will compel even those who are unwilling, to yield one to the other in what is equal and right. To this Lavinus answer'd, We neither accept of thee as an Arbitrator of our Controversies, nor fear thee as an Enemy. But thou seemelt to do very abfurdly in alluming to thy felf the fudgment of other mens Canifer, who art thy felf ggilty of a Crime, and balt not as yet received due punishment for entring Italy without our consent. 'Tis reported that Pyrrhu, walking downe to the River side to view the Roman campe. when he had well and diligently confider'd it, said to one of his freinds, Megacles by name Thele Barbarians have martiall'd their Army after no barbarous manner, but wee shall soone try what metall they are of. Then having placed strong guards upon the bankes, to hinder their Passage through the Fordes, he resolved to expect the comeing of his Companions, not onely for the Reason of War, hopeing the Romans in an enemies Country would quickly be in want of necessary accommodations, but as much regarding the spirit and considence of Levi-nu; whose admiration was by a new Testimonie encreased with him, in that he had freely without punishment dismissed those spies, which were sent to view his Campe, telling them moreover, That he had another Army bigger then this. In the meane time the Campe being so neer, there were many Pickeereings and light skirmishes which tended nothing to the main chance, Almost fifty dayes being now spent in these light skirmishes, the Consul being moved with the same reasons to hasten the fight, as Pyrrhus was to defer it, affembling his Souldiers together, gave them to understand his Intentions, and encouraged them against the fear of a new enemy extenuating, as much as might be, the fame of Pyrrhus, and the Terror of the Elephants; at length preparing himself for all affayes, he resolves either to fight the enemy by Consent, or compel him to Battel. Therefore feeing Pyrrhus still continue in his resolution, he sendeth out beforehand all his horse, as if to forrage the Country, himself with his Legions in Battel Array, expecting till the tumult and noise on the other side of the River should give them warning. The horse setching a compass far from the Camps, cross the River where no Guard was, and immediately advance to the enemies stations on that side the River: The Epirots terrified with their sudden approach, betook themselves to their Camp. Pyrrhus understanding the enemie was so near marcheth in all half to the River with his whole body of horse, consisting of three thoufand, hoping the Romans in their paffage through a blind Ford, striving with the stream and unevenness of the ground and breaking their orders, might there be vanquished. But the Roman horse interpoling themselves, Pyrrhus riding at the head of his Troops, conspicuous in his shining armor, of fingular strength of Body and Resolution of mind, he managed the fight every way correspondent to his Fame and Reputation. He so exactly order'd the whole Battel with his Counfel and Directions, as if he were free from all other labour; yet, as occasion ferr'd, he would charge and fight in person, as if to him belong'd only the Office of a Private Souldier, and that the case of the General iffue were another man's business. In the mean time one Leonatus a Macedonian, having observed a certain enemy, who neglecting all others, intended himself only against the King, as he flew up and down the field, directing his horse to whatsoever quarter he spied him in, gave Pyrrhus notice of it, who answer'd, No man can avoide the Fate of Mortals, but neither this Italian, nor any other, shall grapple with me mithout his reward, and due punissiment. He had scarce spoken the words, when Oplacus (so was the man named, a Captain of one of the Frentan Troops) wounded the Kings horse with his Spear, Leonatus likewife wounding his, whereupon the Kings friends round befetting him killed Oplacus, floutly fighting for himself, and delivered the King. But this accident did much daunt the Kings party, as believing him to be flain: Wherefore to confirm his Souldiers, as likewife to decline dangers intended against him, he changed his Armour and weapons with Megacles, and leaving him in the Fight, went himself to order and lead up the Regiments. The Roman Legions were now come up, and the Battel a long time fiercely continued with fo doubtful fuccess, that 'tis reported Fortune seven times changed, sometimes the Romans sometimes the Epirots turning their backs.

But the death of Megacies had like to have reduc'd Pyrrhus his affairs even to a most defperate condition, who being in the Kings armour was affaulted by every valiant Enemy who affected the Glory of flaying the King: And at length an Horseman, Dester by name, having kill'd him, and taking off his Helmet and Gorget, with loud crys carried them to the Confull, thereby ingenerateing a beliefe in both the Armies of the Kings Death. Hereupon the Grecians were full of Terrour and Consternation, and no doubt had immediately quitted the Feild, but that Pyrrhus affoone as might be, uncovering his head rode up and down, with a loud voyce witnesseing, That he was a live, and present among & them, hereby taking away as much Confidence from the Romans, as feare and Despaire from his owne fouldiers. Lavinus perceiving the Time come, wherein to trie the utmost Remedie, gave the Signe to his Horsemen whom he had placed in Ambush, to fall upon the backe of the enemie. But Pyrrhus against this Troupe commanded his Elephants to be led, which he had likewife referved for the last Terrour to the enemie. This one Contrivance dash't all the Romans hopes, and gave the Issue of Frontinus 2 & the Battaile cleerly on Pyrrhus his fide. For the men themselves being ast onished at the vast bulk of their bodies, and the terrible shew of armed Warriers on their backs thought they had rather feen some strange and formidable Monster, then the shape of any Creature by Nature Paulan, 1 produced; and as for the horse, they being frightned with the fight, smell and noise of bealts Plin.8.6 they had never before feen, did forthwith, confounding their ranks, flie every one what way was most open; and either shaking off their riders, or against their wills forcing them to slight, they ran upon their own battel, and filled all things with fear and tumult. The Rectors of the Elephants following the perfuit, many of those that fled were wounded from those who flood Zonares in the Towers upon the Elephants, and more were kill'd and trodden under foot by the beafts themselves. The Consul making use of his best skill, did as yet keep his main battel together, Plutarib till, by the command of Pyrrhus, the Thessalian wing being sent amongst them, did rout and featter them, not being able to relist. And no question but in the place they were hemm'd in . they had every man been flain or taken prisoners, but that, besides the Custom of Pyrrhus, who Frontinus 2 6 thought it not General like too severely to press upon those who fled, lest by despair of safety they should be provoked to make more sharp resistance, the evening likewise being far spent compelled them to relinquish the persuit. Fortune likewise favour d the remnant of the unfortunate Europius b. 2 Army, in that an Elephant being wounded turned back and with its braying confounded the reft. This putting a Remora to the enemy, gave liberty to those that fled to cross the River into Apulia, where they sheltered the mselves in a senced City against the present danger. I find that in this fight there were fourteen thousand eight hundred and seventy foot of the Romans and their friends flain, with two hundred and fourfcore horfmen; there were taken in all eighteen hundred and twelve, in which number were eight hundred and two horimen; there was loft likewise two and twenty Colours. Whereby I wonder the more why some Authors, who undertake exactly to relate this encounter, deny that any notice was taken how many were want- 010 first 4. 1 ing on the Kings fide, whereas Dionysus writeth, that Levinus lost little lesse then siteen Plusarb thousand, and that on the Victor's side thirteen thousand sell. But Hieronimus Cardianus; an impartial writer of those times, affirms, That of the Roman army there fell but seven thoufand, and of the Kings army under four thousand. But this is by all agreed on, That the Vi-Ctory cost Pyrrhus the very Flower both of his Captains and Souldiers, and that he was heard orofine to fay, He was no less Conquer'd then Conqueror in that Battel. And when he offer'd the spoiles and gifts to Jupiter of Tarentus, he confessed as much, inscribing that sentence in the Title, and when his friend complain'd, he repli'd, Of a truth, if I obtain (nch another Victory, I shall return into Epirus without e're a Souldier. I have likewife an Author that the King himself re- Justin, 18.17 ceived a grievous wound in this fight, but because others report no such thing, and that I often fee the circumstances of several battels confounded, I dare not in the general filence of so many and those more accurate Authors, give credit to one fingle one. That it was fought with great animosity and valour, this one argument is sufficient, That Liv. Epit. 13 when Pyrrhus next day view'd the flain corps (which for the reputation of his Humanity and Europe Clemency he caused to be buried) he finding that all the Romans died with honourable wounds . Florus 1.18,17 having their faces turn'd to the enemy, he cry'd out, How safes were it for me to gain the Em. Dio sput pire of the whole world, if I had but Roman Souldiers! Neither did he defer with any complement and large promises to court those who were in his power, to receive pay under him, and not being able to perswade them, he did, nevertheless treat them with great humanity and clemency, freeing them from chains and whatever other reproach usually attends the fortune of prisoners. But the Romans thus batter'd by the late fight were terrified with another missortune, though not of fo great lofs, yet which caufed more fear and Religious horror. For it was imputed to the manifelt anger of the gods, that their men who were fent forth for forrage and relief, were overtaken by a sudden and most violent Tempest, wherein sour and thirty were amidst the stupendious noise of the Heavens, struck dead by Thunderbolts, and two and twenty Imitten and left half dead, their Cattel also by the same from were most of them slain or made

Pyrrbus in the mean time having taken the empty and forfaken Camp of the Romans, made quick use of his victory, wasting all the Neighbour Countries, and turning many people from the Roman friendship. The Lucanians and Samnites then come in to him, whom lightly chiding, That they had not affifted him in the battel, he nevertheless gave them part of the spoils; therein much rejoycing and exulting, That by his own strength, with no other aid but that of the Tarentines, he had sain so many of the Romans. Pyrebus being thus intent in reaping the fruit of his Victory, Lavinus on the other fide curing his wounded, and recollecting his dispersed men, had gathered together a force no way contemptible. and the Senate (though many imputed the losse only to the Consul's default, and Fabricius faid. It seem'd to him, that the Romans were not beaten by the Epirots, but Lævinus by Pyrrhus) decreed a recruit and supply to be sent him. When the Cryer proclaimed, That they who would ferve their Country in the place of them who were flain, fould give in their names, they lifted themselves so fast, that presently they compleated the number of two

The Conful recruited with these forces, follow'd the steps of Pyrrhus, vexing his Army with what inconveniencies he could. And understanding the Kings Resolution to seize upon Capua leading his Army thither in halt, he prevented him, and preparing all things for Defence, he detert'd him from affaulting the City. Pyrrhus turning his Course to Naples, and there likewise being frustrated of his Expectation, forthwith by long journeys marcheth toward Rome in the Latine high way, and now having passed through Anagnia, and the Hernician Territories, taking in Fregella by the way, he was come to Praneste within Twenty miles of the City; But the Magistrates there, assoon as they understood of the Overthrow, had by Order of the Senate armed their choice young men : and the Fortune of the Roman People had in this the time of their Necessity, provided them another very strong help and succour; For the other Consult Tib. Coruncianus encountring the Etrurians with better fuccels, had tied the whole Nation to new Covenants, and being called back by the senate to the Defence of his Countrey, having no other Enemy to distract him, came home with his Victorious Army. Pyrrhus having in vain attempted to draw the Etrurians again into Armes, and confidering that, befides a City fecure with its own guards, he had two Confulls with their Armies, one on the Front, the other on his Reare, returned back into Campania; where meeting Lavinus with greater forces then before his Overthrow; he faid, He had to deale with a Lernaan Hydra, whose heads being lately struck off, spring up again in a greater Number; yet confiding in his former Victory, he drew out his Army and martiall'd it as refolving to fight, and that he might discover the Cheerfulnesof his fouldiers, and likewife terrifie the Enemy, he cauf'd his men to fhout and the Elephants to be provoked to bray. But the Romans returned a farre greater and more terrible shout, whereby conjecturing the Spirits of each, he judged it fit to abstain from fight at the Present. and complaining of ill omen in the Entrailes of facrifices, he drew back his Army first into his Camp, and afterward with much plunder and a great Troop of Captives, to Tarren-The Romans (who in their hardest times had remitted nothing of their Constancy, but as to the main Iffue of the warre alwayes spake high, as conceiving ample hopes) thinking this a most fit time to give rewards and Encouragement to Virtue, decreed a Triumph to L. Amilius Barbula for those exploits performed in his Consulthip. He triumphed A, D, the fourth of the Ides of July, over the Tarentines, Samnites, and Salentines who were Auxiliaries of the Tarentines. But P. Valerius was order d to draw the Remnant of his Conquer'd Army into the Setine fields, there to fortifie his Camp, and cause them to winter in their huts; About the fame time the Senate disputing whether it were fit to redeem the Captives, resolved affirmatively; that which chiefly perfwaded them; was I believe the Horsemen's Case, for they had flourly maintained the fight during the absence of the Elephants, at whose approach the horse without any fault of the Riders yielded them up to Death, and to Bonds; upon this Errand were fent Embassadours of Principall Dignity , P. Cornelius Dolabella famous for his Desolation of Sena in Gallia, C. Fabricius Luscinus, and Q. Emilius Papus, who two yeares fince were Citero Bratoc, Colleagues in the Confulship : Pyrrbus by Nature was Endow'd with humamity, the inseparable Companion of great Spirits, and that he did encrease by his Ambition, according to the Vulgar Errour, esteeming all Virtues the servants to Domination, to which onely being intemperately given he did direct all his Counfells for the attaining it; And though he were not inferiour to any Commander of that Age in Boldness of mind and the Arts of Warre, yet was he wont to try all meanes before he came to Blows . he would folicite the mind of his Enemy as he faw most opportune with Feare, or Desire, or Pleasure, or Mercy, or with equality and benefit of Conditions. Therefore understanding Embassadours were coming from Rome, and judging so many Confular men were not fent but upon some Grand Affaires, he was in good hopes they would tre it of Compounding a Peace. Therefore that their access might be the fafer and the more honourable, he fent Lyco (by nation a Molossian) even to the borders of the Tarentine Territories, to meet them with a Guard. Himselse on Horseback with rich Caparisons met them without the Gates, and having magnificently brought them in, he entertain'd them with all Respect, liberality and plenty that might be.

> They premifing fomewhat tending to Moderation of the mind, as how great the Inconstancy of Fortune is, both (udden the Changes of Warre, and that future Contingents cannot be foreseen , deliver their Message , That they came to receive their Captives , whether he would suffer them at a Cirtain price to be redeem'd, or to be exchanged for Tarentines and others. Pyrrhus whose Custom it was, not to transact any thing of moment without advice of his friends, convened them now together; and Milo's Opinion was, That he footld detain the Captives, make use of his fortune, and not cease the Warre till he had throughly subdued the Romans; Cineas his Counsell was very different, for, freaking first of the Constancy of the Senate and People of Rome, which they had often shewn even in the hardest times to be invincible; he added moreover, As for other Enemies tis likely we may bate their manners or contemne their Armes, but with this Nation, O King, 'tis better making Friendship then Warre, and 'tis convenient not only to return the Captives, but freely to dismiss them without Ransome; Neither is any delay to be made, but that you fend back the Embassadours with Presents, to conclude Peace upon equals Termes: For this I take to be the time, wherein with honour and Credit you may accomplish a Bifiness (in my judgement) very necessary. For now your affaires having succeeded prospercusty.

And farre be it from Thee, but that Thy Designes should prosper as they have begun; Tet We are but Men, and if Fortune change her fide, neither will it be so easie a matter to Obtaine Peace, neither can it with fo much honour be treated on. When the rest agreed in the same Opinion, the King himselse likewise affenting, commanded the Roman Em - Dio spud bassadours to be called, to whom he spake in this Manner; Tour Errand, Romans, seemeth to Ful. britann. me very unworthy, for having no Consideration of entring into Friendship with me, you require back, the Prioners of Warre, whom being restored, you are ready presently to make use of against me. If therefore you will intend your Minds on better Counsell, beneficiall to both Parties, and make a League and Society with me, I will restore all your Cisizens and Companions in Armes without price or Ransom; otherwise if you continue hostility. I shall think it no wise part, to strengthen your Hatred against me with the hands of so many Valiant men. Neither is Money so Appianus spud scarce with me as to need any from the Romans whom it would better become, if we were Friends, Usinum. to be enriched by my bounty; Withall he commanded gifts of good value to be given the Embassadours, with promise be would bestow more and of greater Price. These things were spo Zonarus ken and acted openly in the Presence of all the Embassadours. But with C. Fabricius he had asterward a longer and more ferious discourse. Neither shall I think it unfit to relate what I find in good Authors; When therefore they had speech together in secret without witness, among other things 'tis reported the King faid thus: My defire is to have all the Romans my Friends, but especially your selfe, whom I esteem above all others, as most eminent in Civill and Military virtues, onely one Thing I am troubled to find wanting in you, that having but flender substance vou are not able to maintaine that Port and Splendour which justly attends Great men as their Due; But I will not suffer you any longer to be sensible of this Injury, and dispite of Fortune, 'I will freely bestow to large a fumme of Gold and Silver, as you shall easily exceed the Reve-'neues of the Richest. For I am perswaded it belongs to my Place and Fortune, to relieve the hard Wants of Worthy men, who have endeavour'd more to obtaine Glory then Wealth: 'Truely I think it to be a faire and honourable Work, and that there cannot be, either a more 'illustrious monument of Kingly Magnificence, or a more precious and Acceptable Offering unto the Gods: fo that I shall rather think you do me a Courtesie, then receive one at my hands, if you will suffer your selfe to be relieved by my Plenty. Neither truely would I urgethis to you if on my side onely the Bounty should feem Glorious, on your side the Acceptance dishonourable But now feeing I tempt you not to Treason or the commission of any Fact misbecom- Plutareb in ing your Grave Manners; what Reason is there why you should with a resolute and obstinate Pyrobo. G. 43. amind refuse a small Gift, with a free and Friendly intent offered? For I defire nothing of you, but, what may, nay of duty ought to be done by the best of Men, and most tender of their Countrys Good, that you would perswade the Senate to forsake their wisful slubbornnels, and recall their mindes to Equity and milder Counfells, giving them to understand the Truth, that neither can the Warre be continued without your great Los and Danger, neither can I (having promised help to the Tarentines, and proved Victor in the first Battell) without manifest breach of faith, and dimunition of mine Honour relinquish it; Neither indeed do 'I delight in fighting with you whom I judge farre more worthy my Friendship then my Hatred, and had much rather return home into mine own Kingdom, where many bulineffes in the interim arife, which require my presence. And for this I will give you what assurance you shall defire, whereby you may be fatisfied concerning my Intentions, and refolve the Doubts of others; if any shall think it not safe to trust to Kings, by reason of the sault of some, who, flanding to their Agreements and Covenants fo long onely as it feemeth for their Profit, when

When the King had thus made an end of speaking after a little distance Fabricius answerd, Concerning my Versue, if any could be observed either in my military or Civil employments, it is needleffe for me to discourse seeing you have already trusted the Relation of others concerning it. Neither is it necessary to declare my poverty, that, being the master of a little ground 'and a finall Cottage, I maintaine my felf neither by usury nor the sweat of servants, but by the labour and excercise of my owne Body, seeing this also you have truly learn't by the difcourse of others. But if, either on your owne accord, or following the Opinion of others, wou judge me, by reason of my poverty, to be in worse condition then any other Roman, you are wonderfully deceived. For despising Riches, embracing Vertue, and doeing my duty, I was never fenfible of any milery; neither in private or publick bufineffe did I ever repine at my Fortune. not only with the Rich, but many times before them? I am dignified with the greatest honours our country affordeth, The heaviest wars are committed to my Charge, I am entrusted with the care of our most holy Devotions, I am call'd into the Senate, my opinion is asked concerning the most weighty affairs, I am commended and chearfully imitated by many; neither am I of less esteem then the most potent man in the City; I seem unto others an example and pattern of attaining Virtue and Glory; to all this bestowing no cost either of mine own or others. For in other places, where particular mens wealth is great, and the publick flock but fimall, the Magistrates sustain the dignity and splendor of their office by their own expence: In our City the custome is much different, no private mans fortune being on any side burthened. All this great and glorious pomp, wherewith our Citizens, who are chosen to the administration of grand affairs, are so magnificently set forth, is of publick allowance; which order maketh all men equal, so that the poorest man shall want nothing for the maintaining either the publick or his own grace, neither shall the richest in any thing abound. Wherefore feeing, though I am the poorest of all, yet I do in no good thing yield to the richest of all; why should I complain of Fortune? should I desire to be equal with Kings, who may hoard 'up vast sums and heaps of gold? But hitherto I have spoken in reference to my life in Publick, even in private also my indigence is so far from being a burden or inconvenience to me, that contrariwife, as often as I compare my felf with the rich ones, my condition feemeth in-'comparably more happy, and I reckon my felf among those few who have attained to as much Felicity as this life admits of, in which regard I mightily rejoice and give thanks to my Poverty. For it feeming to meidle and foolish to purfue after things superfluous, and that 'my little ground being rightly till'd and manured yieldeth all necessaries; I know not to what end I should be solicitous of greater Riches. My Meat hunger makes sweet to me, and thirst 'my Drink; after labour my sleep is easie and quiet; my garments, if they defend me from cold, are of proof sufficient; and my houshold stuff, according as it is apt and sit for those uses it was ordained to, so it very well pleaseth me. So that herein also I should be injurious to accuse Fortune, that it hath not allowed me larger substance then nature defires, which hath neither ingenerated in me a covetousness of what is too much, nor a dexterity of scraping it together. Wherefore with this my poverty I judg my felf more wealthy then the richeft men, yea, then thy felf also; for I have so much that I desire no more, whereas unlesse 'you thought your felf poor notwithflanding your possession of Epirus, and all other your Territories, why came you over into Italy? But Riches you may object, gives one a fair opportunity of doing good to mankind, and that I in my poverty can be bountiful to no body. 'Truly this troubleth me no more then that in other things also I do not abound: That the gods have not endowed me with knowledg superexcellent, and the Art of Prophecying, and ma-'ny other the like things, whereby I might benefit those who in these kinds want help. But if I freely communicate to my friends and fellow-Citizens those things which are in my power, and fusfer every one in common to participate of what may any way pleasure them, I shall think my self free from that crime of being useless or unprofitable to mankind. Neither would I have you esteem those things small and contemptible, because others seem greater in your 'eyes, and therefore you are ready to buy men with large bribes. But, if for supplying the necessities of the poor, Riches were altogether to be defired, and that in this respect the possession of moneys were to be reckon'd as a part of Felicity, as you Kings seem to be per-'iwaded; which, think you, were the better way of purchaing wealth, that I should now with difgrace receive it at your hands, or that I should, when it was in my power, have long agoe 'gather'd it upon most honest accounts? For my prosperous management of Publick affairs, hath given me fair opportunities of growing Rich; as often at other times, so especially when four years lince, being Conful, and lent with an army against the Samnites, Lucanians and Brutians I overcame those large and fertil Territories wasting and spoiling, when being conqueror ' in many Battels, I took by force and demolish'd wealthy Cities, whereupon the Souldiers being 'largely rewarded, and all debts paid which the Commonwealth had contracted with private men for carrying on the War, there was yet fo much remaining that I carried into the Publick 'Treasury sour hundred Talents. Now after I have scorn'd to acquire just and honest Riches by those spoils which were in my hands, and by the example of Valerius Publicola (and others who have advanced the Roman State) have preferred Glory before mony, shall I receive gifts of thee, and embracea shameful and dangerous opportunity of growing Rich, having neg'lected a fair and honourable means? And truly, that wealth I could freely, with pleasure, and good conscience have expended in just and honest uses, which what I receive of you I caunot do: For that money is rather to be accounted lent then bestow'd which proceeds from 'another's bounty, and however it be given and received under the specious pretence of hospitality, friendship or good will, 'tis burthensome to an Ingenuous and high Spirit till it be restored. And what do you think will be the iffue of this business when it is known (as conceal'd it cannot be) if the Censours, who with ample authority exercise the superinspection of Manners amongst us, shall (according to that power wherewith they are invested to enquire into the Lives of the 6 Citizens, and punish those who deviate from the Institutions of our Fathers) publickly summon

' me to give an account of the reasons, why I received any Gifts from thee?

These things being spoken and heard on both 6.43 fides, the King at prefent contented himself, but on the morrow, causing Fabricius to be sent for, he prepared an Elephant before hand to frighten him, who standing at their backs behind the hangings as they were discoursing, the hangings being on a sudden withdrawn, at the Masters command laid his snout on Fabricius his head, making a most horrid noise; but he, being a man of a fetled spirit, gravely turning himself about, smiled, saying, Neither yesterday did your gold entice me, nor to day your beass terrifie me. After the same manner he spent his whole life, insomuch as in all his Patrimony there was not fufficient whereby to raife Portions for his Daughters; (an Honourable poverty!) fo that the Senate caused money for that purpose to be disbursed out of the Publick Treasury, being asham'd to let those Virgins passe without Dowry, whose Father was not ashamed to leave so. The same vertue and continence was found in other Princes of the Senate; among the rest 2. Fabine who had so often been in Chiefe command, and having once borne the Censourship denied Author de viris to be made Censour againe, saying, It was not for the good of the Commonwealth, that the illust. fame men fould ofcen be chosen Censour; he died with the fame Testimony both of his poverty and the peoples Love for after his Death they bestow'd so much money that his son Q. Gurges did bestow a dole of siesh upon the people, & likewise made a publick Feast. Curius out of the same gallantry of mind refus'd the gifts of the Sabines as Fabricius did the Samnites: Æmilius Papas, Cicero in Lelio who was in most offices Colleague with Fabricius, also Tib. Coruncianus, and many other Ennius apud men of great note, by reason of their likeness in manners, lived together in great love and 15 Citame friendship: So that the Poet seems to me to have conceived in his mind the Idea of those Aug. de Civ. times, when he faid, The Roman State was upheld by men and manners of the old Fashion. Pyrrhus Det. ferioully confidering and pondering these things, was inflamed with a great defire of composing all Fustin. 18.1 differences with this Nation, and immediately restored two hundred of the Captives without Plattreb Ransome, and gave leave likewise to all the rest to go to Rome and visit their friends at the Feast Pyrtho c.44 of Saturn now approaching, relying only on the word of Fabricius, who promifed, That when the Holy-dayes were past they should return, unlesse peace were in the mean time

Romans had taken away from the Samnites, Apulians, Lucanians and Brutians might be riftered; and in Lieu, the Romans Bould receive their Captives without Ransom. Cincas of whom mention hath formerly been made, was at that time with Pyrrhus, a man as of great knowledg in Civil affairs, so of very honest principles, and who had by exercise improved his natural wit to a marvellous eloquence: For these his qualities he was very dear to the King, who often acknowledged, He kad won more Cities by the Eloquence of Cineas, then by his own Armer. This man being fent Embaffador to Rome, with much cunning delay'd making his addresse to the Senate, till he had in Pyrehus his name distributed many gifts in the houses of the principal men. Being then brought into the Court, when he had in many words, Extelled the virtue er Pyribus, and his inclination towards the Romans, he discoursed of the Equity of the conditions he brought, infomuch that great part of the Senate were moved to accept them : because befide other conveniencies, he promifed. If they would defift molefting his friends, he would furnish them with aid sufficient for the Conquest of all the rest of Italy. But, because the Consultation lasted many dayes (the Fathers being very solicitous in a business of so great consequence) and thereby a suspicion and rumor was spread, that peace would be concluded Appine Claudins, who by reason of his Age and blindness, had of a long time been absent from the Senate, caused himself now to be carried thither in his Litter, where he no sooner appeared, but his fons and fons in law with all Reverence and Duty receiving him, conducted him to a place becoming his Dignity. Every one being filent both at the novelty of the thing and with the respect they bore his person, and expecting for what cause, after so long absence and retirement, he should now come into the Senate: he beginning his discourse with the afflicti-Applitume spud on of his ficknets, faid. His Blindsefs had indeed hitherto been very grievous to him, but now Fabrican His. he was not only delighted in it, left he should behold those things which were doing, but was 'forry that his eares also were not deaf, that he might not hear things so fordid and unworthy the name of the Romans. For what is become of your noble minds? whither are your 'spirits fallen? Ye were wont to be of opinion, when ye heard the Fame of Alexander the · Macedonian renowned as of an invincible King, that his glory was more to be imputed to his 'Fortune then his Virtue; that if the Fates had allotted him a Roman War, both the event 'and likewise his esteem amongst men would have proved far different. But now, behold how 'ye are degenerated from that your Magnanimity; ye once thought ye were able to conquer the Macedonians, and now ye stand in fear of Molossians and Chaonians, the perpetual prey of the Macedonians. Ye once contemned Alexander, and now are frighted by Pyrrhus, not the fervant of Alexander, but his fervants fervant, who flying from his old enemies rather then feeking new, is come over into Italy with a resolution, should it please the gods, to obtain the Empire of Rome, with those forces wherewith he was not able to keep and defend his 'little share of Macedonia. Unless therefore we fend him back well beaten, laden with great missortune, affure your felves, any other Party, deservedly slighting and scorning our Power, will greedily venture into Italy, as to a prey ready prepared to their hands. For what can be thought of us, but that we are a cowardly flothful people, if Pyrrhus, being received into friendship. shall carry back a Reward for that Disgrace he hath done us , in as much as by his means it is come to pass that the Romans are become a Laughing flock to the Tarentines and

This was the main scope of Appius his Oration, which did so inflame the minds of all the Senators, that, following him the Author of a severe Sentence, they with one consent decreed, That the War fould be profecuted, that Cincas fould the same day depart the City, that Pyrrhus Bould be given to understand, That neither he should be admitted into the City, (for that allo was defired) neither would they so much as treat of friendship and society, till be had quitted Italy. A like sad decree by Appius his motion was made concerning the Captives, That they Bould not be led in War against Pyrthus, neither sould they any where be joyned in the same company, but that being fent to several Garrisons, they sould, as a note of infamy, change their manner of fighting, that they who before served on herse-back, should now be lifted among the foct, and they who were of the Legions, Bould now ferve in light armature; That no man fould recover his former order, till he had brought in the spail of two enemies. 'Tis reported, when the Frentinus ftrat. Embassadors returned with this sharp answer, the King astonish'd at the wonderful constancy of the Romans , asked, What they thought of the City and of the Senate? and that Cineds answer'd, The City feemed to be a Temple of the gods, and the Senate an Affembly of

After these Transactions, some think , Fabricius was sent an Embassadour to the King : but they are easily convinced of Errour as by the Testimony of other Authours, so by a right Consideration of the Series of Affaires. There being now no hopes of peace, they converted all their thoughts to War, and busied themselves on both sides all winter in making diligent preparations. Thef. I take to be the Times wherein Pyrrhus is reported, (for the avoiding the Dangers of shipwrack, and a more convenient paffage of the Italian and Epirot Succours one to the other) to have had thoughts of making Bridges between Hydruns, where Italy gets farthest into the fea, and Apollonia, a Town scituate on the adverse shore, some fifty miles distant : For that is the Bredth of the Sea in those places between the Gracian and Italian shoares. M. Terentins Varro is faid afterward to have made the like Attempt, when, being Cn. Magnus his Lieutenant in the warre against the Pirates, he guarded the Sicilian and Ionian seas with his Navy. In the midft of these doings Tib. Coruncianus the Conful Triumphed A. D. of the Calends of February. This year was a remarkable Cenfourship in that a Lustration of the army was then first made by one of a Plebeian stock. There were cessed two hundred seventy eight thousand, Epit. Livie 13. two hundred twenty two Citizens. About these times it was that 2. Fabius Maximus was parmin in Faworn to be chosen Prince of the Senate; and by conjecture we gather, his son 2. Gurger was fair. Censour at that Time. Cn. Domitius certainly was, for he lustrated the Army, and his name is famous for enlarging the Priviledges of the People. Pyrrbus in the beginning of the fpring, calling together the Forces of his Confederates, marched into Apulia, where he took many Towns, some by Force, some by Composition. Against whom the two new Confuls P. Sulpicius Saverrio, and P. Decius Mus went forth with two Armies pitching Camp against Camp, Europiu neer Afculum a City of Apulia, of the same name with that City of the Picentes. No doubt Cluotris Italia, was made of Fighting, but they were many dayes hindred as by a deep Torrent running be- Zonaras tween them, fo by mutuall fear on each fide. The Romans were troubled with remembrance of the former Battell wherein Pyrrhus was victorious: The Epirots were daunted at the Roman obstinacy, but chiefly at the name of the other Consull, so fatall to the Enemies Legions: For it was given out that P. Decius after the Example of his Father and Grandfather would purchase the Victory with his Death; and the issue of those Battells wherein they died, did make the expectation of the Decian Devotion to be terrible to all

That the Event of Battels was not in the Power either of the Goddels Links. * Earth, or the Infernal Deitys, who were invoked by that Charme, that they ought not to believe the Gods to be so unjust as to alter the fates of Armies, and beltow conquests for one "mad-man's fake; that victories are not obtained by jugling tricks, and superstition, but by fighting onely; as appeares by the Testimony of the Romans themselves, who come not into the field with troopes of Priests and Prophets, but with Legions of armed souldiers to oppose the Enemy: But because the ignorant are commonly more terrified with these superstitious delusions, then with true causes of feare, he shewed that this feare might be prevented, by Zongras I shewing the Habit wherein the former Decii had Devoted themselves, and warning the souldiers if they met any Man in the like accourrement not to affault him with any weapon, but to take him alive. He caused likewise a Message to be sent to Decius, That be should forbear playing the foole amongst armed men, neither sould his Plot take Effet, that if he came alive into his hands he should perhaps endure more tarments then he was willing. 'Twas answer'd by the Confulls, They had Confidence enough in their Armes, neither had any need of fo desperate a Design, which that he might be assured of, they gave him his Choice, whether he would come over the River interjacent, or Expett the Romans on his fide the mater; that they would willingly withdraw their forces to give him a safe passage over, or, if he would retire, they would bring over their men, that on each side encountring with their strength entire, demonstration might be made, that they reposed all their hopes of victory in their men, and their Courage, and in no other thing: Pyrrhus was ashamed of betraying any kind of fear or Doubt; he accepted therefore of the latter Condition and gave the Enemy Liberty of foording the River. Observing therefore the Nature of the place, which by Plutarch reason of the Ruggedness of the Ground, and the multitude of Osiers thereabouts growing, Frontinus would well admit of a foot Army onely, he placed his horse and Elephants in the Reserve. The State 3.3. Right wing he strengthned with his own souldiers and the Samnite Auxiliaries. The Brutians Lucanians and Sallentines he placed in the midft, the Tarentines, whose virtue he least confided in , he order d in the midft. The Confull's main body confifted of their Legions, some of the light Armature being conveniently intermixt; and with the like Discretion they distinguished the Orders of their Referves. The Armys being equal, not Thurse only in Courage but in number (for they were fourty thousand strong on both fides) disputed the business with as much heat and animosity as could be expected, and the Victory inclining to neither fide, the night broke off the Fight. The next Morning Pyrrhus when he had guarded the most difficult places, forced the Romans to descend into a more even and open ground; there he had some use of his Elephants, which being suddenly brought in to that part of the Battell where the Chariots were prepared against them, they frighted the horse (even as it hapned in the last fight) and caused them to fly; but to the Foot they did little harme. mans had the upper hand, their Victory being occasion'd by an accident, for the Apulians (who were by the Kings Order fent against those who came to surprize the carriages) by their departure feeming to fly, by a mear error and falle fear caus'd all the Kings forces to quit the field and fly indeed. The number of the flain is likewise expressed, That on Pyrrhus his fide twenty thousand en the Romans fide five thouland were wanting, that the King with a dart shot through his arm was grievously wounded, and that in vain endeavouring to stay the flight of his men, was by his Life-guard brought out of the field one of the laft; that on his fide three and fifty Colours were left, on the Romans eleven, and that Fabricius the other Confuls Lieutenant was likewise wennded. But contrariwife, others fay, This Battel had the like event with the former, though the Romans by reason of the vicinity of their Camps Sustained not so much lost; but that they did confes fedly fly, and loft fix thousand men; that Pyrrhus left three thousand five hundred and five, as is in the Kings Chronicles registred by the Testimony of Hieronimus.

The Supplement of Livie, Book III.

And not only variety but Repugnancy of Authors moves me rather to incline to those who report the event of this Battel to have been doubtfull : for 'tis ordinary after an equall encounter for each part to attribute the victory to themselves, which by the negligence or Impudence of others is committed to writing, doing very ill to deliver to Posterity for true and undoubted. those things which are grounded on Idle report only, or for affection are partially related. Wherefore their history feemes more probable who affirmes, That there was but one Fight neere Asculum, and that, after an bot dispute and much blood feed, the Sun being now set, the Kings wound and the leffe of the Baggage did with much adoe breake off the fight: That then both Armies sounded a Retreat , when on both fides there were flaine about fifteene thousand; and that this was the time when Pyrrhus answer'd one who congratulated his victory, If the Romans are thus to be Vanqui fed we are undone our felves. And indeed the sequel confirmes this Opinion. for Pyrrhus retired to Tarentus, and the Confuls, making no pursuite after the enemie, distributed their forces into winter quarters in Apulia, whereas the time of yeare gave them leave and Reasons of War might well have perswaded them, to have prosecuted so glorious a victory. Moreover I find not that these Consuls made any Triumph, and many think that P. Decime in this Battel devoted himselfe, who dying as did his Father and Grandfather, yielded himself the Third factifice, without intermission out of the same family, for the good of the Commonwealth: Which as I had no thoughts to gain-fay, So fhould I not have related in the general filence of all Historys , but that a grave Author M. Tullisu Cicero in his bookes of Phylosophy more then once maketh mention of it. The fight at Afculum thus ended, the rest of the yeare de Finibus 3.19 was quiet and free from all warlike Expeditions, only the whole time spent in Constitution and preparations. Pyrrhus, having lost most of his old forces, friends, and Commanders, leaves the state of the control of t into Epirus with order for a supply of Men and money for next spring. But before that Navy could be fet forth, new hopes arising alter'd the Kings Counsels. Pyrrhus had sometime the posses sion of Macedonia, wrelting it out of the hands of Demetrius, and again lost it by the Power of Lysimachus, Now while Pyrrhus waged war in Italy, Ptolomaus Ceraunus being slaine by the Gaules, there feemed a new way open into Macedonia, being destitute of a Prince and the Diadori Eclog. flate of affaires in Confusion. This Reason perswaded him not to leave Epirus naked of souldiers, left it should be obnoxious to the injurys of the Gaules who now oppressed the Neighbour nation Macedonia. But Pyrrhus did not as then steere his Course homeward, being upon other Occasions (as shall be related) call'd into Sicily. The winter being past, over in these Cares the New Confuls came to the Army (. Fabricins Luscinus, and Q. Æmilius Papus (who before had born a Consulfhip together) which Pyribus understanding drew forth his forces, intending to observe the Marches and Counsels of his enemy. Their Camps being not far distant, there hapned an Accident very remarkable, and by most men related much after the fame manner; One Timechares an Ambracian, who held a good honourable place in the Kings favour, fecretly came to Fabricius, and promifed him, if he would give him an answerable reward to Poylon the King, which he thought was easie for him to accomplish by his sons, who were Cup-bearers to the King. Fabricius, no way delighted with the Treason, informed the Senate of it. the Senate, not discovering the Treason of Timochrares, who had (by what means foever) intended the Roman profit, fent Embaffadors to Pyrrhus, who should only in general warn him, That he fould look well about bim, and take heed of what mens fervice be made ufe of, and enquire into their faithfulness and honesty. Thus Valerius Antius relates the bufiness. But Claudius Quadrigarius in stead of Timochares make Niceas the undertaker of this Poysoning, and that notice was given not by the Senate but by the Confuls, reciting also the Letter of the Confuls, wherein they discover Niceas his design, That they are unwilling to fight by craft, or with mony, and wish the King safe from Treason, hoping he will become an Illustrious Ornament to their Victory and Triumph.

Some Report it was the Kings Phylician who treated with Fabricias either in person or by Letter, and that upon his discovery, he was hang'd. As there may be doubt in these Circumstances, fo no question they are deceived who say that Curius sent back the Physician to the King. Tis faid that Pyrrhus at this time wondring at the Experience of so great Vertue in Enemies, cry'd out, This is that Fabricius, who can with no leffe difficulty swerve from the Rules of Juffice and Honesty, then the Sun be turned out of his Course. He did immediately, left he should be Overcome with Kindnesse, return the Romans all the prisoners he had, and sent Cineas again to obtaine peace and friendship. It seemed dishonourable to receive a gift from the enemie, whereby they might be thought to have abhorred wickednesse more for gain then for the love of Vertue, they therefore fent back an equal number of Tarentines and Samnites that their captives might not be received gratis. This publick abstinence was to their greater Credit seconded by the vertue and resolution of private persons, when the gifts of Pyrrhus (which Cineas in Livin, 34.4 great Number and those very pretious had Carried to Rome for both sexes) were refused not #ustin 18.2 only by the Men but by the women. For when upon the refusal of some, he profer'd them to Val Maximus. others, and others again, there was not fo much as one man or woman to be found fo mean or 43.14 covetous as to open a door for the Receipt of a Kings gift. The Former answer was now again returned to the Embaffadours, That until Pyrrhus had quitted Italy, they would esteem him an Enemie to the people of Rome. While Pyrrhus was much perplexed at these passages, not knowing how to profecute the War with any cheerefulnesse, nor willing to depart Italy with any losse Appian of Reputation, the Sicilian affaires did feem to help him, the management whereof (after long and doubtfull deliberation) he refolved to undertake. For so he thought the Roman war might with credit be declined, and the command of a most Rich Island obtained, he had also an earnest defire of being revenged on the Carthaginians, as being first provoked by Iuffin. 18.2 them. For they suspecting the Kings deligns, had a little before hand sent Mago with a Navy Val Mari, 3.7 of an hundred and twenty thips, faying, The Romans onght by Forreigne aid to be offifted againft Livie Epic. 13 a forreign enemy. And though the Romans used not their affiltance, making answer, The they were not wont to undertake any War but what could be managed by their own forces; Yet now this fourth time was the League renewed between the two Commonwealths.

To the former Articles it was added, That whether the Romans or Carthaginians made peace with Pyrrhus, it should be specially excepted, that they might assist one the other, which soever of them were provoked to War; And, that when either had need of the others help, the Carthaginians should provide ships, each party pay their own souldiers, the Carthaginians aid the Romans Justinius. by fea, but not be compelled against their wills one of their ships. Which being agreed upon, Mage went to Pyrrhus under pretence of treating of peace, but indeed to discover the Kings

Counsels, whom the Carthaginians had understood to be invited into Sicily: And they offer d their Navy to the Romans not fo much out of any good will or care of their fafety, but further to involve Pyrrhus in his Italian War, left he should spoil their successes in Sicily which slow Diodori Eclog. rished so prosperously. They had then also guarded the passage into Sieily with a numerous book 22 fleet, pretending the fiege of Rhefsum, but indeed refolving to hinder Pyrrhus from transmit-ting his Army. For these causes did he wholly apply his mind to the Sicilian affairs, which filled him with great hope, as by the state of things, so by the frequent Embassies which came one after another out of the Island, affirmed, That he was defired by the prayers of all men, as the only remedy of their calamities wherewith they were more sharply afflicted then the most miserable Nation under the heavens. For after the death of Agathocles, more lamentable then undeferv. Diadori Eclog. ed, one Mano, born at Ageffa, a City of Sicily, who had poison'd the King, endeavouring b.21 to usurp the government, was by Hicetas the Pretor expelled the City, and fled to the Carthaginian forces: Hence arose an heavy war and unfortunate to the Syracusans, by which never the less Hicetas in particular strengthened himself, and turning his forces against Phintias of Agrigentum, he held the Island long time in trouble, till by the boldness of one Thanio he Diodori Eclog. was deprived of his Domination which he had held for nine years. Thanio endeavouring to retain the Soveraignty, was relisted by Sofistratus a Syrasusan Nobleman. These two along Livie 25 24 time contested, Thanio possessing Nasus, an Island which is part of Syracuse, Sosistratus exercifing the Tyranny in the other parts of the City. When at length by these discords they faw nothing but deftruction likely to enfue, with one consent they decreed to fend for Pyrrhus, who being the fon in law of Agathocles, and next in fuccession, as having a fon by Diodorus Lanassa, was thought fittest to bear rule, as being able by his courage and his forces to settle Appianus apud Langia, was those were the principal men of Agriculum and Leontium, offering the Go. For the Carthaginians having wasted Diodorus their grounds, had belieg'd the City of Syracule, both by fea and land, with a Navy of an Platarch hundred ships, and an Army of fifty thousand men. Pyrrhus therefore without delay sendeth Cineas before (whose wisdom and faith he much trusted to) to agree upon Conditions and Applan Articles of friendship with the Sicilian Cities. At his departure he comforted his Italian confederates, promiting, That if they were oppressed by the Romans he would in speed come out of Plut. Pyrrbo the neighbour Island much encreased with new forces. But when he was about to leave a Gari- 654 fon in Tarentus, they taking it in ill part , defired , He would either perform his promifed affistance on those conditions he was call'd in , or that at least he would leave their City free. They could obtain neither, Pyrrbus returning no other answer, but commanding them, To tarry his leifure. The Epirot King being thus imploy'd, the Confuls had the easier war against their other enemies. I find they had about this time good success against the Etrurians, Lucanians, there was no Triumph made for that war, neither was the whole nation, but few Cities engaged, who re-affumed against the Romans those arms they had so lately laid down, being solicited by the Samnites, who found themselves left naked by the departure of Pyrrhus. Among the

An affembly of the people being held, New Consuls were chosen for the year ensuing, P. Cornelius Rusinus again, and C. Junius Brutus again. Other Nobles were Candidates with Saintilian i. HILE these things were doing in Italy, Pyrrhus having shipp'd his Army and Elephants, failed from the Tarentine Port into Sicily, after he had continued two years and four moneths in Italy. Being conducted by Thanio, who met him with his Navy, he was received by the Sicilians with wonderful chearfulness, freely delivering up into his hands their Towns, their Forces, their Mony and their Ships, Being thus in a fhort time possess d of the dominion of the Gracian Cities, he did also by force of arms extort from the Carthaginians all whatfoever they held, excepting only the City of Lilybaum, which the Carthaginians being helped by its convenient fcituation, defended against all his assauls. Whence justly conceiving great and vast hopes in his mind, he resolved, leaving his eldest fon the Patrimory of his Father, to fettle the other two, the one King of Italy, the other King of Sicily. Both the reputation and virtues of this King were indeed at that time very great; and the Sicilians having for many years fuffained both forreign and civil wars, and a plague worse then both, the tyranny of usurpers, feemed willing with joy to entertain any indifferent Prince over them. But when, a little after, he proceeded to raise moneys against their wills, and put to death some of their Nobles, he contracted much hatred, which was encreased by the covetoninels and arrogance of his Officers, whose vices did every where as much wrong him as his own; therefore next to the first and principal care Kings ought to have, of being themselves Egregiously good, 'tis for their honour and fafety to make a choice of virtuous Favourites, feeing private men are blamed only for their own faults, but other mens crimes are imputed to Princes. But these things hapned afterwards. Now at Present, while their Zeal was hot, he was with the highest Honour and magnificence received, first by Tyndarion Prince of the Tanrominitans (for in that part of the Island he landed) then by the People of Catanaa, and so passed with his foot-Army to Syracuse: His fleet he commanded to be brought about not farre from the shore, ready prepared for fight, as thinking the Carthaginians would not fuffer him to approach the City without hazard of a Battell. But it hapned, that a little before Thirty of the Carthaginian thips were upon other Employment gone from the Navy, which because they were not return'd the Admirall refused to venture on the Fight with the Reft. Wherefore Entring without Re. Dionys, fistance, Thanion and Pisisfratus yielding Possession, he took into his hands the Publick Trea. Diodoris fure, an hundred and twenty Covered ships, Twenty open ones, their Weapons, Engines, and all other Furniture for Warre.

In the Interim came Embassadours from the Leontines, whose Prince Heraclidas offered the City and all his Forces, Four thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse. Neither were other Cities flower in their submission, but came in driven as it were by a Torrent of Fortune. Pyrrhus treating them all with much Humanity, and gaining their Good wills, fent every one back to his own City, extertaining now more Ample Hopes in his mind, intending if affaires proto the November 1 to pale over into Africke. Things went not for well with his Confederates in Diodori Italy, for Milo, who was left at Tarentus with part of the Army, was not able to proteed them Belog baz; from the hoftlity of the Romans, now in the ablence of the King and his main strength. But Zongran. as yet it was well for them that the Romans deferring a while the Tarrentine warre , both the Confulls converted their forces against Samnium. The Samnites (feeing their Fields burn't their Castles surprized, the whole burthen of the Warre to fall on them, and that they were forfaken by their Friends) being inferiour both in strength and Courage, forfaking their Townes and Villages, betook themselves to the high and craggy Mountaines, carrying with them their Wives and Children, and what things of most value they could in such a Tumult and seare convey away. Among the Romans belides the Emulation of their Commanders, there was arisen great Negligence and Carelefness (the Inseparable Companion of Prosperity) caused by their own Confiant good fuccels, and their Enemies Fear. Hereby they fuffered fome Lofs and more Difgrace; for their fouldiers confidently creeping up craggy and difficult paffages were beaten back and deftroy'd by the Samnites, who had poffest d themselves of advantageous places; many were flain, being overwhelmed with stones and Darts, or tumbled down the Precipices; others having no convenience either of retreating or fighting were taken alive. This Accident caused the Commanders to divide their Forces, for each laying the blame of the Misfortune upon his Colleague, boasted he could have managed the business with better success if he had been alone. C. Junius with his Legions remained in Samnium, P. Cornelius drew out his forces against the Lucanians and Brutians; where carrying about the Terrour of his Armes, wasting the Grounds and burning the Villages, he had occasion offer'd of greater Attempts. In the utmost parts of the Italian shore, towards the East and the Jonian sea, where the promontory of Lacinum ftretcheth forth it selfe, is seated Croton of old very famous, and now also considerable for it's Wealth, Through the midst of it in those dayes ran the River Esarus, ovid Metan on each side whereof the Multitude of Buildings were encompassed with a wall of Twelve miles circumference. This City the Confull not daring to beleagure, had thoughts of obtain- Livie 24.3. ing by Treachery, for he was put in hopes by many of the Roman faction there, that if he would Zonarus timely advance his forces to the walls of it, being now destitute of forreign Aide, he might ea-fily take it by the help and assistance of those who were weary of Pyrrkus his Domination. But it hapned about that time that either out of fear of the Enemies Neighbourhood, or suspicion of Treason, which is seldom long hid, the Crotonians had procured aid from Milo: Nich:- Frontinger machus came to them with a strong band of Lucanians, who issuing out upon the Consul (not strategem, 3.6, aware of any thing, but confidently coming up to the walls without fear of Danger) beat him back with the flaughter and wounding of many of his Men. Rufinus defiring by Counfell to remedy that loss he had by his Rashness sultained, on set purpose encreaseth the Rumour of his Overthrow, and that he might feem strucken with the greater fear pretends to defift from his Enterprise, commanding the Baggage to be pack'd up as for a sudden Departure; This News was quickly blaz'd about the City (as from a Camp fo neer must needs be) and besides a probable cause of the business, their Credulity was help'd forward by their desire to have it so; when on a fudden (their mindes being already thus inclin'd) a certain Captive (being thereunto fuborned by the Confull, in hope of Liberty and further Reward) comes into the City, as if in this hasty departure of the Romans he had taken opportunity to Escape; He informes them that Cornelius Rufinus, having not strength enough to force Croton, was gone to Locri, being inwited by some who promised to betray it to him. By and by comes another who confirming the former news, added moreover, That the Romans were now on their March. And withall they Zonaras discover his Ensignes and Troopes moving that way which leadeth to Locri. Nichomachus being deluded by this Wile, marcheth swiftly with his sorces the neerest way to Locre, intending likewise to defend it, which when Rusians by secret Messengers understood, he turneth back presently to Croton, as upon better advice, so with better success then before. His diligence was Frontinus made prosperous, not only by the security of his Enemies, but by the favour of Fortune also, for a thick mist chanced to furround him, so that he was almost within the walls with his Zonaras of it felfe ample enough, was abundantly encreased by other as glorious successes; Fortune feldom observing a mean on either hand. For Nicomachus perceiving himself to have falninto a remedileffe Errour, not knowing what to doe, as he returned to Tarentus, Was met by Rufinus, lost great part of his men, and very hardly escaped himself with the Rest; When not being content to defend one Citie he lost two. For the Locrians likewise being animated with this successe, having slain the garrison Pyrrhus left among them, with the governour of it, whose oppression they could no longer endure, betook themselves to the friendship of the Romans. Nowithflanding this Proceed of affaires, the Samnites and other nations were not for far dejected, but that ftill they refolved to endure the worst that Fortune could bring upon Appier epud them , encouraged , befide their own innate obstinacy , with their Hops of Pyrrhus's Returne . hearing the news of his victorys in Sicily. For Pyrrbus (that we may relate his actions out of Itely also, which were performed in those times and places, having influence upon, and being joyned with the Roman affaires) having fetled things at Syracuse and Leontium, went about the same Disdori Eclog. time with his Army to Agrigontum, meeting Meffengers by the way with News, that the has Carthaginian Garifon was thrust out of the City, and that the Agrigentines yielded themselves and all they had into his protection; which accordingly at his coming they did. For Soffrains (who had delivered up Syracuse to him) together with the Citie, presented him with eight thouland foote, proper young men, and eight hundred horse, a force nothing inferiour to the Epirots Pyrrhus brought with him. Thirty other Cities, which Sofistratus had the command of,

These things thus transacted, he sent to Syracuse for all forts of weapons and engines, which were of use in the siege of Cities. For now his design was to assault the Cities under the Carthagipian Jurisdiction, having an army of thirty thousand, besides fifteene hundred horse, and the Elephants he brought over into Sicily. The first he tooke was Heracles, where was a Punick garrison, then Azona; After which the Selinuntians, Halicyaans, and Ægellians following his fortune for fook the Carthaginian party, giveing an Example to many other Townes in the lame quarter of doing the like. The Erycines, confiding in the number of their Auxiliaries and strength of the place, he was resolved with all his power to affault, having therefore order'd his men, himselfe armed, coming up toward the walls, Vowed a Vow to Hercules, if that day he should manifest himself to the Gracians a Warriour worthy of the Race he came of and the office he bore. After the figne was given, and that the defendants, with a cloud of arrowes being driven from their flations, gave way to the placeing ladders upon the walls, the King himselse first of all men entred into a most noble fight against all opposers, tumbling some down with his sheild, slaying others with his sword, and terrifying all with the greatnesse of his Courage and strength; neither was this fight more glorious to him, then in every consideration prosperous; for without receiving any wound, with great honour he gained the Cirie at that one ftorm, his fouldiers being no leffe animated by his Example then fearefull of his danger, for both which reasons they fought with the greater contention. He then did facrifice to Hercules according to his vow, and for many days exhibited Plays and Shows of feverall kinds in great Magnificence and Pompe. In this year I find there was a Triumph at Rome over the Lucanians and Brutians before the Nones of Innuary. But I wonder to find it afcribed to C. Iunius, feeing Rufinm his Province was amongst them, and that he tooke two famous Cities, and that other likewife committed great flaughter amongst them, taking away man and beaft by a common Murrain; but was most formidable in Abortions, for there was no young ones almost of man or beait which came forth fafe and entire, infomuch as it was believed the anger of the gods would confume all living creatures. Which Affliction made the other Confulthip of 2. Fabins Maximus Gurges very famous, wherein he had C. Genusius Clepsina for his Colleague. And yet they left not off their war against the Samnites and Lucanians; and two certain arguments there are that they made great flaughter of their enemies, for the same year Q. Fa-Capitol, Trium. biss the Conful Triumphed over the Samnites, Lucanians and Brutians in the Quirinals ; and those people sent Letters to Pyrrbus and Embassaders, declaring, They were utterly undone without (preedy hilp; that they could no longer sustain the power of the Romans, but must of necessity prevent the uttermose extremity by yitlding up themselves. This thing much inclined Pyrrhus to depart the Island and transport his forces again into Italy, seeing also his assains now to be more difficult in Sicily, by reason the affections of men grew cold; and, by the consideration of fome injuries received, were turned into hatred against him. When therefore he had polletled himself of Eryx, and placed a Garilon init, he marched to the City of the Agins which is of a very convenient scituation, near the Haven of Panormus, and well fenced with works; there being received with the good will of the Citizens, he removed his

Polybiat 1:00 eth to it: This he took by force, and having likewife taken a place called Epirate, seated in Dionyl spate a pleasant mountain, but upon hard passages, between Panormus and Eryx, he had now the Diedori Eclog possession of all the Carthaginian Province, excepting only Litybaum. This City was lately built by the Carthaginians, as an habitation for the Mortians, whose town Dionysius the Tyrant had in the Punick War demolished. Wherefore the Carthaginians, seeing that of all their dominions in Sicily, their hopes were confined to this only place, resolved with their utmost strength to defend it against the preparations they understood Pyrrhus made for the siege of it. Wherefore bringing in thither a confiderable strength of Souldiers, with plentiful provision, as likewise amunition of all forts (which they had opportunity enough to do, having the command of the feas) they diligently adhibited all care possible to fence it on every fide : Especially where it lay open to the land they erected many Forts and Towers, encompassed with large ditches: Their work was the fooner finished, in regard the town being for the most part of it built upon the Rocks of the fea, needed no artificial Bulwarks in those places. Now, though they made great preparations for the War, and had hired many forces, as from other Countries, fo from Italy alfo; yet they fent Embassadors, promising, If they could obtain peace upon equal conditions, to affift him with mony and fisps. Pyrrhus would hear no mention of money, Zonsris. defiring only to retain those Cities he had taken, seeming willing to allow them the possession of Plutarib Lilybaum. But the Kings friends, and the Sicilian Princes enforming him , That fo long as the Pyrrho c. 1.50 Carthaginians held Lilybæum, (as a ladder ready prepared whereby to scale all the rest of Sici-Diodorus ly) the Island would never be void of the fear of them; caused him to return answer, That there was but this one condition of peace he would agree to, to wit, That they sould clearly quit Sicily, and suffer the sea to be the bounds of either's dominions. The hopes of peace being thus broken Distorm off, he draweth his forces forthwith toward the City, and Marshalling his army not far from the walls, in such order as those who were tired might (by turns) be relieved by fresh men, he began the affault. But the Lilybætans having a fufficient number of fouldiers to defend them and being provided of Engines and Amunition kept the City safe. For the Carthaginians had

Pyryhu, according to his wonted Boldnelle fighting in the front of his Battel, received a wound in his head, which when he was gone aside to dress, one of the enemies of large stature, and gallant in his Armour, advancing before the rest of his Fellows, Challeng'd him with a loud Voice, bidding him, If he were a live, to come forth. Pyrrhus burning with anguer, and Terrible in Countenance, the blood running a bout his face, his men not being able to hold him, wade a sudden affault upon him, and with a blow on his head struck him to the ground. 'Tis reported, his sword was so well temper'd and his Arme so strong, that at one stroke he cleft the Man in funder, even from the head to the bottom of his body, his parts on each fide divided falling to the ground. The enemie terrified with the strange novelty of this spectacle, and admiring him as above the ordinary Ranke of Men, left off the fight. Pyrrhus, being rid of this trouble, had notwithflanding little joy. For, inafmuch as he now lost part of his Carriages, and that the wealth he had gather'd by the spoils of the Sicilians, was lost in his last fight with the Carthaginians, he was in great want of moneys, fo that his fouldiers murmuring for pay, knowing not how elsewhere to provide it, he was compell'd to seize upon the Treasury of Proserpine: Her Church at Locri was in those dayes most famous for the Reputation of its holines; which town, when Pyrrhus had taken by the affishance of his faction within it, he committed many horrid facts by flaughter and rapine, more then the just revenge of his flain Garrifon did require. But there being nothing left which men would or could contribute to him, he laid hands on the holy money, being urged thereunto by his worft friends, who had most commonly been the authors of every pernicious counsel: These were Evagorus the son of Theedo-rus, Balacer the fon of Nicandar, and Dinarchus the fon of Niceas. They did not only per-fwade Pyrrbus, telling him that all things must yield to Necessity, but were themselves instruments in the sacriledge, diging up a vast summe of Gold, which had many years been pre- suidas in ferved in vaults under ground. 'Twas an old opinion, that the Peftilence might be flayed by the Dictatours strikeing in of a Naile; for the Experiment of which hopes tis Livie 7. 3. probable that P. Cornelius Rufinus was chosen Dictatour, for as the greatness of the Calamity Pighius in might well provoke them to try all Remedies, fo we find that Rufinus was the year after taken Annal Romanis notice of by the Cenfours, when he had been twice Confull and twice Dictatour, neither can there be found a more certain monument of, or a more convenient place for that his Dictatourthip. Against the fickness providing what Remedy they could, their Chiefett care and diligence was required in matter of Armes , especially in regard of the Difficulty in raising Men. For besides the length of the Warre, the continuance of the Pesulence had made men weary of entring into action, infomuch as the young Men did with wonderful Obstinacy decline the fervice. But the severity and constancy of M. Curius Dentatus the second time Confull overcame this their wilfulness, for he now had entred the Magistracy with L. Cornelius Lentulus his Colleague. When therefore in the Capitoll he first began his Leavy, because no man answered, he caused the names of all the Tribes to be cast into an Urne, and the Pollian Tribe Varro in Suyra coming out first, he caused the first man of that Tribe whose name was drawn to be summon'd; Tegovlos J. and when he refused to appear, he sequestred and fold his Goods; when afterwards he appealed Jackahu. to the Tribunes complaining of the Confulls Injulice, he fold him alfo, faying, The Common-Livie Epit, 14. wealth had no need of Such Citizens who knew not how to obey. The Tribunes nevertheless did not relieve him, and afterward the example being judged very wholesom grew into Custome that when a Leavy was rightly and duly made, he who would not be a fouldier should be fold for a flave. With these and the choice young men of the Tarentines he entred Samnium, but found not the Inhabitants fo obedient as heretofore, they came not in fo freely and readily as they had done, not only because their courage was over-wearied with the great and many losses they had fustained, but because they were justly exasperated, imputing all their calamities to Pyrrhus which they had not suffered, had not he by his departure into Sicily betraid his Italian affociates. Nevertheless he gathered together so great a strength, that he sent one part into Lucania to bulie the other Conful, while himself encountred Man. Curius, thinking if he once over-came him, he should easily complete his Victory over the rest. But the Roman very well underitanding, that there is no Battalia comparable to the Macedonian Phalanx, when it hath Stat. 2, 2. Chufing therefore out of his Army those who were most forward, he resolved to affault the Roman Camp in the night time, when he might not be discovered. But while he prepared all things for his intended purpose, he Dion. spud fell into a deep fleep and dreamt, that the greater part of his Teeth fell out, and that an abun-Fulvium dance of blood flowed out of his mouth; in confideration whereof being much perplex'd, he intended to defift from his enterprize; but his friends earnestly perswading him, Left be fould Culverius Italia never again have the same opportunity offer'd him, he gave order to advance. fair and open plain which is called by the name of the Taurafine Fields. Now Pyrrhus beginning his journey from the Lower grounds up to the hills and woods, when his lights failed, was wildred for want of knowledg in the wayes, in fo much that (the day breakeing) he was discovered from the Roman camp. The Romans being moved at the unexpected approach of the enemie, yet, (because there was no doubt made but fight they must, and their facrifices now proveing more favourable) with the Confull's conduct cheerefully issued our and falling upon the foremost of the enemy, (who were far from the Main body, and not in very good order) drove them backward, killing no small number of men, and taking some Elephants which the enemy left behind. This fucceffe encouraged Curius, to follow his Fortune and descend into the open field in Battel-aray prepared to fight. Neither did the Epirots make any delay. The encounter was very fierce and furious on both fides, but the Romans having had the upper hand in the late skirmish, were much fuller of Courage and hopes. The Epirots giving back, Pyrrhus now again fought Refuge from his Elephants, and thereby (one of his own wings flying) he forced one of the Romans Wings to retire even to their Referve. There had the Conful placed a strong force (resolving upon this occasion to engage himself) which he commanded, being now fresh, to renew the fight, and beat back the Elephants. Former experience had taught them an easie and ready way to oppose these beafts, that they were fooner diverted by fire then the fword : Against them therefore were provided Iron instruments involved in much Pitch and Tar, which, being fet on fire, were darted upon the backs and Towers of the Elephants, and whether they light on the skin of the beafts, or on the wood of the Towers, they fluck faft by reason of their hooked sharp points. These instruments and divers forts of darts, being flung from the upper ground, drove the Elephants into fury, partly by terror, partly by the pain of their wounds, fo that their mafters not being able to govern them, they rushed back upon their own battel, filling it with fear and slaughter. The beginning of this Rout is reported to be by a young Elephant, which being wounded in his head, fent forth a querulous noise, at which known voice the Dam was first startled, and she increasing the tumult, at length the rest were all in consusion and turned into slight. Very remarkable was this fight, both for the number of the flain and the fruit of the victory. For Pyrrhus being hereby utterly overthrown, neither did the reft of Italy long hold out, neither, after Italy, was any other Nation and King able to fland against them. The faid the King in that Battel had thrice the number of the Romans, even four foore thouland foot, and fix thouland horse; of these they who report the most say, six and thirty thousand were slain, they who report the least, Frontinus Rest, say six and twenty thousand; thirteen hundred were taken prisoners, and eight Elephants. Pyrrhus with a few horimen escaped to Tarentus. The Camp of Pyrrhus being taken, as it caufed admiration, fo was it of great use to the Romans. For they heretofore, as other people, ordered their Camp scatteringly by companies in the manner of Cottages: Pyrihus is held to be the first who rightly measuring and dividing spaces, contained the whole Army within one Trench: and by his example the Romans being affifted, and adding what they thought convenient, attained to that most perfect manner of pitching their Camps which afterwards they

> This year was very famous, not only for their happy war abroad, but by reason also of Domestick affairs, and the notable severity of their City Discipline. 2. Fabricius Luscinus, and 2. Emilius Papus, being Censors together, took away from many the Publick horses, and pasfed by many in calling the Senate. But most remarkable was Cornelius Rusinus his note of Infamy, who having been twice Conful and twice Dictator, was ejected the Senate by the Cenfors, and this reason given of his Punishment, That they found in his bonse the weight of ten pounds in plate to serve at meals: And in this Condition not only himself but his Family for a long time remained, whereof not any one attained to the highest honours, before Sylla the Dictator.

Such was the Parlimony of this Citie in those dayes, and afterward so great the extravagancy that it was by the Fathers condemned as an argument of intolerable Luxury, what their children would shortly esteem but a base and contemptible piece of housholdstuffe: Every mans estate being cessed and valued, the Army was purged by sacrifices; there were cessed two hundred feventy one thousand, two hundred twenty four Citizens. Both Confuls entred the Capitoll in triumph, first Curius, whose triumph was the more illustrious, as for the same of his Exploits, and great joy of his victory, so did it exceed in Pomp and splendour. For heretofore their triumphs being over poor People their neighbours, were fet out only with broken armes and Gallick waggons, nor any spoiles led but flockes and herds of Cattel But now there was a worthy shew both for the varietie of Nations which were led Captive before the Chariot, and for the Beauty and Magnificence of the spoyls. Epirots, Thessalians, Macedonians, Apulians, Lucanians, Brutians were led Bound, there were carried Painted Tables, the works of choice and rare Artificers, Gold, Purple, with other beyond sea rarietie, and sense are the influence of the Tarentine Luxury. But the most wonderful and joyful spectacle were the Elephants with their four Towers on their backs. (for the rest were dead of their wounds) This was the first time they were ever seen at Rome; the common people called them Luca-Bulls, giving them their name from the creature they were hitherto best acquainted with, and their denomination from the place they first faw them in ; within few dayes after was the other Confulls Triumph nothing fo gallant, though his performances were not to be despised; he had overthrown the Samnites and Lucanians, and taken many Townes, but in comparison of Carins Overtinown use Sammers and Locamans, and Loc of the spoiles, because by his help chiefly a Certain Town of the Samnites was taken While the Romans thus enjoy'd the comfort of their Victories, the Enemy was in a far different posture. They had been long weary of Pyrthus his Domination, but now after this unhappy fight, their mindes were so filled with fear and Indignation that they could take the Conqueit, thought of nothing more then how to get fafely and honourably out of Italy, But keeping his Counsell to himselse, he encouraged his Associates, That they should not be cast down by one unluckly Overthrow, that they had not received so much loss by the last fight, as by the former they had caused to the Romans, who notwithstanding could not be perswaded to Peace upon equal Conditions; That now they should imitate the Roman Constancy, and reserve them-Selves for better fortune, and all would yet go well; That there is yet strength sufficient left, whereby to maintain a long Warre ; That in Greece he had many Potent Friends, from whom he might certainly expelt succour. Neither were these things incredible, For he had already, especially Justinus 17. 2, by Prolomy (who was then King of Macedon) been manifelly affifted; he being then in great Estimation both among Greeks and Barbarians, being much honour'd by the Etolians (then Dioxyl. apud a most powerful Nation) as also by the Macedonians and the Kings of Illyrium, having obliged Valifium fome by Courtefies, others by Fear. Yet all his boafting was more with intent, to retain his Confederates (now ready to revolt) in Fidelity, till the seas were open for his Returne, then to continue the Warre in Italy, or that he put any Trust in Forreign Aid. Sending neverthe- Paulinianb, 1, less his Embassadours to the Kings of Asia and Macedonia, of some he craved moneys, of Justinus 3,2. others Men, of Antigonus (who was then King of Macedon) he craved both. With thele hopes keeping his affociates firme to him (having in the mean time underhand provided all things for his Departure) his Embassadours now returned from Antigonus. Assembling therefore his own and the Italian Princes, he read unto them not those Letters which now he re- Polyanus ceived, but others which came before from Antigonns, promifing plentifull Affiltance sud- strategement. denly to be sent; By this Craft having deluded both his own Affociates, as also the Romans 6.6. who garrison'd neer him, the night following without any hindrance he hoysed saile, and made the Ciraunian Mountaines a Promontory of Epirus. But that he might feem not difhonourably to have relinquished the war, and ingenerate a beliefe of his Return after he had accomplished the Design he was call'd aside for, he left behind him Milo to desend the Castle of Tarentus, and that he might not onely by hope of Reward, but by fear of the like Punishment, continue faithfull, he gave him a feat whose cover mas made of Nicias his skin, whom he had put to death for his Treason against him. Leaving therefore with him a garrison of fouldiers, with the Rest (to wit eight thousand foot, and five hundred horse) he returned plutarch into his Kingdom, having been fix yeares absent. At Rome not knowing but that Pyrrhus Pyrrho.c. 57. would renew the warre, they did at their Affembly choofe M. Curius Confull again, because he onely having had good success against the King, was thought like to carry on the warre with greatest Authority, and best fortune, of the Patricians Ser. Cornelius Merenda was chosen, being promoted by his late purchased honour, and the Commendation of his Countreymen, under whole command he was last year; These being made Consull sconverted the heat of the warre against the Lucanians, Samnites and Brutians, who defending themselves rather by the Difficulty of Places then by Armes, gave no occasion of any Memorable action like the former. Neither was Curius his Glory hereby diminished; every one still judging, that that Valiant K. Pyrrhus fled not so much for the overthrow sustain'd, as fearing such a Captain as Curius now again coming forth against him. To him therefore was attributed the Glory of Livie having chased Pyrrhus out of Italy, and finishing the Warre. In that year which followed Epit. 14. Curius his Third Consulship, there came Embassadours from the Alexandrine Kings with Eutropius, b.z. gifts to Rome, and in the Confulship of C. Dorso and C. Claudius Canina, Ptolomeus Philadelphus hearing of Pyrrhus his flight, fent to congratulate with the Romans, and to defire to be Esteemed their Friend and Associate. head of the delinquent, and buryed her alive at the Colline Gate. While the fame men were Consuls there were Colonies planted, Cula among the Volscians, and in Lucania Pastkum, which the Greeks call Posidonia; this City the Lucanians had taken from the Sybarites, and from them it lately came under the jurisdiction of the Romans. The memory of the year following is more notable, as putting an end not only to the war of the Sampites and others, but of the Tarentines alfo. L. Papirius Curfor, and Sp. Carvilius the fecond time Confuls, having Lucania, Samnium, with the Brutians and Tarentines for their Provinces, did by their wisdom and worthy deeds fulfil the expectation of all men, for indeed this pair of Confuls was on purpose chosen in hope of finishing the War this year. The Samnites being conquer'd by Carvilim the seventy first year after the war first began, did now with greater faithfulness receive the Livie 31 31 conditions of Peace imposed on them. Lu. Papirius with great flaughter having overcome the Brutians and Lucanians, compelled them to fue for peace. But (as it happens in one main war against many neighbouring People, the confines of whose Territories were interchangeably mixed) Papirins had to do also with the Samnites, Carvilius with the Brutians and Lucanians, and both of them with the Tarentines. Neither were the forces only of the Tarentines routed and put to flight, but their City also recover'd into obedience. Which business ought to be the more punctually related, because, besides the Victory of a most famous City, it comprehendeth

the death of Pyrrhus, the subtilty of the Carthaginians, and the first beginning of emulation

cted by reason of his successin Macedonia, did strengthen the minds of the Italians against their present losses. For being a man of a fierce stirring spirit, not able long to rest, he had made war upon Antigonus, because he sent him no assistance into Italy, and overcoming him in a fet battel, had almost driven him out of his Kingdom. Whence the Romans were in perpetual fear leaft he should return into Italy with a more numerous Army, and renew the war more heavily then before. But his unexpected death did fuddenly cut off both his hopes and fears of all men. For being infatiably defirous of encreasing his power, under pretence of refetting Cleamens in his Kingdom of Sparea (being then at odds with Areus) he entred Peloponnefus with a purpole to keep it in his own hands; and though he did in vain affault their City, yet he afflicted the Lacedemonians with great calamities: In Argos, in the mean time, there being two Factions, Aristippus the head of the one called in Antigonus, Aristias Patron of the other invited Pyrrhus to his relief and for the pulling down his adversary. For Antigonus was also come into Peloponnesus to affist the Lacedemonians against the common enemy. In the same night at divers Ports were both the Kings forces admitted into the City by the Argives. Pyrrhus understanding his men were hard put to it, entred the City himself, and beholding a Brass Statue of a Wolf and a Bull as fighting, was presently possessed with an opinion of his approaching death. For he was informed by an antient Oracle, That that place would prove fatal to him where he should see a Wolf and a Bull fighting; he was therefore resolved to draw back his forces and retreat out of the City. But the Elephants and fouldiers coming in to his fuccour, meeting Helenus the fon of Pyrrhus, quite stopped up the passage, so that some ftriving to go out, fome to come in, the enemy likewile fore preffing upon those who gave back, the Argives, Macedonians, Epirots and Lacedamonians who came along with Areus, fome Elephants also, all crouding and being crouded one by another in narrow litreets, caused great sear

So milerable and void of honour was Pyrrbus his death, then whom that Age brought not forth any man more worthy, either for Courage of Mind, Soundness in Counsel or Skil in Marshal affairs, befides many other endowments both of Soul and Body. But by his Ambition he destroy'd the fruit of all his Labours, and defaced the Ornaments of his Virtue; he would have been much more happy if contented with his own fortune; and certainly the most potent Prince living had he used as much Wisdom and Circumspection in keeping what he got, as did Valour and Industry cause joy in some Cities, and sorrow in others. Other People who were at their own disposal, bought their Peace of the Romans upon what termes they could, But the Carrifon of the Epirots, and Milo governour of the Caltle restrained the Tarentines from using their Liberty. Between whom, by degrees from lighter injurys and Reproaches, at length brake out open Enmity; fo that the Tarentines being on each hand preffed with great Difficulties, having the Romans their Enemies without the walls, and the Epirots within, fent Embaffadours to crave fuecour from Carthage. The Carthaginians, who possessed great part of Sicily and wished the Coast-Towns of Isaly rather in their own hands then the Romans, readily came with a mighty Navy, pretending only to cast out Milo, but resolving, if they gained Tarentus. to Livie Epitom; maintain it against the Romans. When therefore L. Papirius the Conful was also come, Taren- 14 tus was that up on all fides, the Romans beleaguring that part of the Citic and Castle by land, the Carthaginians besieging the same Castle by sea. The Romans, in this state of affaires, being no leffe folicitous lest the Carthaginians should take the Castle then that themselves should loofe it, subtilly attempting all means of victory, treated with Milo by Convenient Messengers, That if by his means they obtained Tarentus, they would suffer himself, with all his Men, safely to depart with hag and haggage. Milo, sending nothing at present more convenient for him, deals with the Tarentines. That joyning Counsels together they might deliberate on their Common safety: and at length perswades them , To fend himself Embassadour to Papirius , diligently to conclude on Articles for all their Benefits. As they had willingly hereunto affented out of wearineffe of Cares and dangers: Milo accordingly, being gone to the Conful, with whom he had fecretly contrived his Defigne, brings back prety faire conditions, and a most certain hope of making an agreement not to be repented of. The Credulous Tarentines hereupon with much fecurity and confidence lay afide all care and Circumspection, giving Milo opportunity of delivering not only the Castle, but also the Citie it selfe up to the Romans. The Carthaginians no whit contented with this Event, neverthelesse pretending, Themselves friends to the Ro. Zonaras mans, and that the only cause of their coming was to Expel Milo, hoised fails and returned. Oropus 4 3 Some Authors affirm that the Romans forwarned the Carthaginians, That if they intermedled Livie Epitom in the Tarentine affairs, they would make a breach of the League, and that they not only flighted this admonition, but fent Auxiliaries to ftand in Battel against them; upon which account chiefly the War brake forth between the Romans and Carthaginians in Sicily; though the Carthaginians, willing to cover their fault by Perjury, took Oath, That they did nothing with evil Gotefreidus, or deceitful intent. And that it was occasioned chiefly upon the Mamertines account, while the League was entire between the Romans and Carthaginians.

The Confuls returning home, were received with the joy and falutes of all, and triumphed CapitelinaMarin great Pompe, with much Goodwill of the People. In the mean time Q. Fabius Gurges, mora and the others who were fent to Alexandria, relate in Senate the Refult of their Embaffage, Iuft. 18. 2 That they were received and Entertained with all kind of Hospitality and Benevolence, that great and Magnificent gifts were sent to them at their first arrival, but much greater at their departure, that they thought it to become the Roman dignity and abstinence, modistly to resuse the first, that the other, which were by all means to be received, they had, before they did any other bu-Valer. He was a man indeed of high deferts, as for the greatnels of his Exploits, fo for his many Illustrious examples in other Virtues; as we shall by the by manifest, by relating some of his Actions and Sayings; For I count it not unworthy or unbefeeming the Office of an Historian, to recount those things whereby those who are hereafter to undertake the management of publick affairs may be no leffe instructed to the attaining Felicity by Virtue, then by Military counsels and performances. In the Sabine War (when there was Strabo by fuch plenty of spoils that Fabius the writer of the History, thinketh the Romans then to have had the first taste of Riches) Curius, claiming nothing of so rich a victory, but the conscience and fame of it, continued in his former poverty and hardinesse of life.

For when the Grounds of the Enemy were appropriated to the Common wealth, he distributed to every private Person but forty Acres by the Man: And the Senate allotting him a greater portion, he being contented with the same Measure he had meted to others, said, He

H E most potent enemy of Rome being now after many battels vanquished, and peace fetled throughout all Italy, The Senators entred into Consultation how to make a good use of their Victories. They concluded to fine all Nations who had born Arms against them; the loss of part of their Territories, taking a more fevere revenge of the Tarentines, by how much the more wantonly and intemperately they had offended; they were therefore commanded to refign up all their Arms and Ships, their Walls were demolished, a Tribute imposed upon the City, and nothing granted them but Peace and Liberty. There was now nothing of an old fcore more to be intended, then to punish the Treachery of that Legion, which circumventing the Rhegians by craft, had now for ten years possessed their City. They for eleeing that the Roman affairs proceeding so prosperously, their wickedness would not paffe unrevenged, had very diligently taken care for whatfoever belonged to ftrengthening the City, and provided all things for their own defence, being very confcious that what is obtained by cunning and violence, cannot but by the same arts be maintained. Besides their own innate Fierceness, they much confided in the friendship of the Mamertines, and were puffed up with their success against the Carthaginians and Pyrrhus, whereby they had sufficiently made experiment of the itrength of their City, and the courage of their own minds, having quickly repulfed the enemies from the fiege. They fored therefore to fuch an height of Rebellion, that daring to take Groton, which was by some betrayed to them, they slew the Roman Garrison and demolished the City. Wherefore L. Genucius the Consul, who was that year Colleague with C. Quintions , had commission to execute vengeance upon them, and the Rebels being confined within the Walls, the City was befieged. But while they strongly refisted with their own and the Mamertine forces, the Conful having fultained fome incommodities, and become in want of necessary provisions, was affisted with Corn and men by Hiero, who was at that time Prince of Syracuse. For he, being offended with the Mamertines, did likewise hate their affociates of Rhigium; he was likwife moved by the encrease of the Roman power, to preoblige them to future benefits, as occasion should serve.

The Citie being at length forced to yield, the Mamertines were by the Conful difmiff'd upon certaine Covenants, the Runaways and thieves, many whereof had fied thither as to a fanctua-

This act of Justice did much increase the Reputation of the City of Rome, and thereby was gained no leffe Love from all the Italians and neighbouring People, then their armes had caufed fear. In the Confulship of C. Genuncius, and Cn. the market-place torn into pieces limb from limb. At Formii the walls were faid to be often ftruck and cast down with thunderbolts, and news was brought that in the Calenian fields, the earth opened, and fire fuddenly brake out, which flaming for three whole daies together, burnt five acres of ground to aftes, infomuch that not only all the fruits on that placewere blafted, but even the Trees died at the very Roots. These things caused more seare then misery at Rome; No great matter ensued, but that a War was Europius b. 2 made against the Picentians, which being the next yeare finished, added likewise that province to the Roman Jurisdictions. Now in the Citie began the Coining silver, (their wealth being Livie Epit. 15 encreased by their victories) whereas before Brasse only was used in all Exchanges; but then Zonaras pennies and half pennies were made of filver, which went for ten, and five pounds of braffe; there were likewife leffer pieces which being eftermed at two pound and an halfe of braffe, were Plin.33.3 from their value called, Sestercies. The Confulls C. Gallus and C. Fabins went forth to apprehend Lollins the Samnite, who having been Hostage at Rome had privily escaped, and now possessing a certain Castle, committed Plunder and Pillage round about, firring up the minds of his Countrymen to Rebellion, when they were fearce well composed by the last peace.

But he with the forces he had gather'd (being for the most part unarmed) could not long refift: The greatest difficulty and danger was in the Province of the Carcines (a part of Samnium near the Frentanes) where the Romans affaulted a well fenced place, the Receptacle of Lollins his spoils, and from great hopes falling into as great fear, did at length obtain the Victory. Some of the Garrison upon condition of Pardon, let the Romans into the walls in a bright Moon-shiny night, and the Townsmen mustring themselves together upon the tumult; when they first began to fight a great drift of snow fell and took away their fight: This accident was a great help to the Carcines against the Romans, who were ignorant of the Passages, in so much that they were in very great danger, and now ready to give back and retreat (which in the dark could not have been done without much loss) when on a fudden the fnow ceased and the Moon shone out again, and then being freed from blind fear, they did by their courage make way to Victory. These combustions were the cause why the Picents were not vanquished in those Confuls time. But the year following P. Sempronius Sophus, and Appius Claudius Craffus the fon of Ca.

About these times was a Colony planted at Ariminum in the Picene grounds, which belonged to the Senones of Gallia, and another at Maleventum in Samnium, but changing the Name, which seemed Ominous, they called it Benevenum. The Sabines who were many years agoe admitted into the City, had now the liberty of Votes granted them. Claudim had also business in Ombria, where betook Liv.Epir.15 Camarinum and fold the inhabitants for flaves. Greater was the joy for the Picentine Victory, which was thought worthy to be Coined in their new Pieces of filver, that it might the more publickly be known, and the Memory thereof transmitted to Posterity. Q. Cadicius the son of Quintus, by order of Senate, took care for coining the Money, representing on one side Pieus the son of Saturne (for he is thought to be the Father of that Nation) on the other side a Roman Magistrate reaching forth his hand to a suppliant. And that, by subduing of that Country, a great accesse of strength was made to the Romans is Manifest, in that three hundred and threescore thousand Picentians subjected themseives unto them. For that War the Consuls, as they deserved, did Triumph, but Sempronius his Glory was the greater, in that with more dangers and hazzard he had fought against the stronger enemie; For a suddain Earthquake, being very prodigious, happened, as

The quarrel was pretended because they had received Pyrrhus into their Havens and Towns when he came first out of Epirus. But indeed the much truer causes of the war were thought to be the Conveniency of the Haven of Brundusium, where ships may go in and out with the fame wind, the easie passage from thence into Illyrium and Epirus, and that they eleemed it very opportune to have the same Bounds both of Italy and their own dominions. Both the feas being generally fetled, the Roman greatness began to be famed and taken notice of by the neighbour Islands, and the Continent ad joyning to the fonian and Adriatick fea, causing in some hopes, in others fear. For they who by violence and injury to their neighbours enlarged their own power, feared the Romans would prove an hindrance to their proceedings, the others contrarywife looking on them as a Succour, fent to them from heaven against the Oppression of their adversarys. The Apollonians were the first, who sending Embassadours to Rome craved their friendship; their Citie is seated threescore furlongs from the lea, being built by the Corinthians and Corcyreans, having a very commodious haven, where the neerest passage is from Bundusium into Greece. The Illyrians and Macedonians are adjacent to them, so that against strong and Coveteous neighbours they had much adoe to preserve their own liberty. The message was wonderful welcome and with much Humanity received by the Romans, not so much for the wealth of the Citie Livit Epitom, which was but small, as for Future hopes in that they thought a way laid open and occasion Lis. spud Pagiven them of greater defignes heresfter: Infomuch that very fevere punifiment was inflicted on certain noble young men who upon a quarrel arifing had ftrucken the Embaffadours. Le Zurati Falins was not protected either by the Dignity of his office, for he was then £dile or the greatnesse of his Extraction, but was delivered up to the Apollonians for his offence. Cn. Apronius who was likewise Adile, was given up for the same crime, the Senate decreed, shey should by

Heralds be delivered up into the hands of the Embassadours that a Quastour should goe along with them to Brundusium lest their friends and Kindred should rescue them by the way. This was a great testimonie as of their publick saith, so of their wisdome; For having a defire to draw forreign Nations into their friendship by the Reputation of their Justice, it much concerned them most preciflyto punish the injuries done to those who first came to enter into their society. Neither would any thing have proved more destructive to their designs then that the Appollonians should would any uning have proved more detailed, and others of their example. And hence forung that cu- B.17.ff. de Lefrom, which was conftantly in after times observed, That they who had strucken the Embal guis. fadours of a free Citie should be delivered up to it. But the Appollonians, when they were brought Zonzas into their Citie, wifely confidering they should gaine more by Clemency and humanity then Revenge, fent them safe home again. This year each Consul triumphed twice; D. Junius the fifth of the Calends of October , Numerius Fabius the third of Nones of the same Month over the Sarfinates, a people of Umbria. Againe they tryumphed over the Sallentines and Meffapians who had affilted the Sallentines, Fabius on the Calends of February, Junius on the Nones. And this was the Conclusion of all their Italian Wars; For what was acted in Volsmia next year, Quintus Fabius Gurges the third time Conful, L. Mamilius Vitulus being his Colleague, was not fo much a war against a just enemy, as vengeance inflicted upon flaves in behalf of their affociates. those who were formerly their servants. For by very ill and foolish advice (whether it were that thereby they thought to increase their strength so much broken in the late wars, or that themselves tumbling in delights were loath to trouble themselves with the labour of Arms) they made their servants free of the City, and committed the Militia into their hands. Af Johannes Anterward they began to be chosen Senators, and to bear Offices of State. In short time oppress tiachenus fing the old Citizens, and usurping the whole power of the Commonwealth to themselves, they spud Fales did moit infolently exercise their Liberty against their Masters who gave it them. It was now grown common to Ravish Virgins and honest Matrons by force, to heap Contumelies and Indignities upon Parents and Husbands, crying for justice according to Law; and all things were confusedly hurried according to the pleasure of the vilest most petulant Knaves. And that we may not pass over in silence a rare Precedent, to what issue the beastly impudence of slavish minds will proceed to when it hath gotten power, they made a Law , That the Libertines might Va Max.9.1.2 have licence of Copulation with the wives and daughters of their Patrons, and that the Maiden-ext. bead of a Virgin designed in marriage to a true Freeman, should first be profitored to one of their Order. Wherefore the old Voltinians being neither able any longer to endure these milities, Zonaras nor by their own power to repulle and avoid them, fecretly confulting together, refolved to fend Auti de wiris Embassadors to Rome. They having by private folicitations prevailed that the Senate would Illus, e. 26 meet in some private house (for they saw unavoidable ruine over their heads if the business was known) they did by a very forrowful discourse make them acquainted with their sad condition, wherewith the Fathers being moved to compassion, promised them assistance for the recovery of

But these things which were thought to be agitated in secret, were by a Samnite discovered to the parties complained of; For he, a guest to the master of the house where the Senate met, being then fick. was by forgetfulneffe left in a place where he overheard all their discourse and betrayed it. Therefore the Embassadours, after their Return from Rome, were called into question, and the whole businesse being found out, were with other prime Men of the Citie Iuliu obsequents cruelly put to death. The Romans, now having a juster cause of War, sent 2. Fabius the de Proligius Conful with an Army against them, whom, daring to encounter him in open field he put to c.27. flight, and slew a very great Number in the Pursuit: The Rest who betooke themselves into their place of defence, he refolved with counterworkes to beliege. But they making strong Relistance, The Conful (as there were frequent Pickerings and light skirmishes) unwarily venturing too far in the fight, received a wound whereof he dyed, which the besieged understanding, made a Sally with the greatest strength they could, hoping if they suddenly assaulted the enemy now in trouble for the loss of the Conful, to force them to break up the fiege. But the event of the battel was contrary, for being roughly received by the Romans, they were beaten in again

In this fight I suppose Decius Mus to have had the Command; for he might happily have been Fabius his Lieutenant, and after his death be chief in managing the War till a succeffor was fent. And hence I conjecture it comes to passe that some negligent Historians have ascribed Amb de virus to Decim Mas both the beginning and similaring of this War. Cn. Cornelins L. F. Cn. N. illust. c. 8 to Decius Mus both the beginning and miniming of this was. On the fame Capitolina Blaffo and C. Marcius were created Cenfors that year, and this last having before born the same Marmora Office, was from this his Magistracy called Cenforinus. The moderation of this Marcius was Val. Maximus very remarkable, who being inverted with Power which he fought not after, affembled the poor ple together, and in a grave speech chid them, That they had twice introffed that Office to the Same man, whereas their forefathers did in this very consideration limit the time of it, because the power was too Great. Hereupon a Law was made, That the same man should not be made Censor the Plut. Cornl.c. 1 Second time. The same year the number of the Questors was encreased; in former times there Livit Epit. x5 were but four, two for the City, and two to affift the Confuls abroad in the Wars. But after-

Tacinus 11.12.6 ward their Taxes and Customs encreasing with the Commonwealth, there was a necessity of doubling the number. Appins Claudins who in the time of his Magistracy was surnamed Cau-Agellim 17.21 dex, and M. Fulvius were Confuls the year enfuing, which was very memorable, in that then first began the war between the Romans and Carthaginians in Sicily. Then first brake out Hostility between two most potent Cities, which after many years, after many bloody overthrows given and received, could not at length be ended without the utter ruine and destruction of one of them.

But, before we enter upon the History of the War, it will be necessary to relate something of former times concerning Carthage; for in the enfuing Narrative many things will occur, hard to be understood and judged of, unless both the Original and encrease of that City be first known.

BOOK VI

HAT Carthage was built by the Tyrians of Phenicia (besides the constant agreement of old Histories) the perpetual friendship of those Cities while they flourished, as also the manifest likeness both of their Language and Manners doth clearly testifie. 'Tis reported that Elisa (who was likewise called Dido) the daughter of Agenor the son of Belus, flying out of her Country (by reason of the hatred she bore to her brother Pigmaleon for the unjust slaughter of her husband Sicham) entred that Creek of Africa, and possessed that Peninsula where Carthage was afterward built; her small beginnings promising little hopes of fo great power and wealth as afterwards was obtained: For 'tis believed Dido purchafed no more ground then might be compassed with the hide of a Bull or Ox, which being cut out into very slender thongs contained a larger space, then the sellers did imagine, and it was fufficient whereon to Erect a Castle, which from thence is thought to be called Byrfa. Afterward feeing (many placing their habitation near them for Traffiek fake) they began to look like a City, and that the Africans were willing to entertain among them men forich and very gentle and quiet, they hearkned to the counsel sent from Dica (which was also a Colonie of the Tyrians) which advised them, After their example to build a City. So it was agreed, That the Africans should afford them ground, and that the Phanicians in recompense thereof should pay

The work being finished, Dido gave it a name in her own Language, Carthadas; the Greeks called it Carchedo, and the Romans by an error in Pronunciation, Carchego. This City having Loving Neighbours, an Indultrious people, and what was above all, a Wife Queen, did in a florttime wonderfully increase. These things seeme to have been acted some seventy years before the foundation of Rome; for about so ancient a Circumstance Authors do not very well agree. But as Eli/a her life was notable for variety of Chances, fo was her death very remarkable. Tarbas a Petit King of some African Province, sought to marry her, threatning upon refusal to raife war against her. But as she was averse from marriage by reason of her singular Chastity and love of her former husband, fo the very well understood that in these tender beginnings of affairs, a war would prove fatal and destructive; therefore taking time to deliberate, as if she had at length overcome her own Resolution, and were inclined to marry the African, caused, a Pile of wood to be erected before her intended marriage, whereon to facrifice to the Infernal gods in behalf of her bushand Sichaus; And after many Sacrifices offer'd, the did at length afcend the Pile, and killed hes felf with a fword she brought with her; her love to her Husband and Sub-jects exceeding the care of her own health. The Carthaginians returned her what honour they silina Italic, could, and while the Commonwealth flourished, worshipped her as a Goddes, raising a 4.3

Temple in the place where the lived, calling her Dido, which in their language figuifieth a Virago. Servine Ful-When after her death no man was thought worthy to faceced her in the Kingdom, the Citie Eindi. 344 began to be governed by the Mixed Power of Nobles and Commons. The Name of Kings still remained, but they were like the Lacedzmonian Kings; but that the honour was not to any Ariflot. Talit. Certaine families annexed, but conferred on any Prime Man who exceeded others in Virtue and Riches. These had the management of Wars abroad (wherefore the Romans called them Pretours and Dictatours, comparing their power with the usuage of their own Commonwealth) at home they were Princes of all publick Consultations, with their advice the affaires of the Ariffolio Citie were ordered: Things of heigher concernement were referred to the people, their fentence decided all controverse between the Kings and Senatours: They also had authority to alter the Laws made by the Kings and Councel, it they seemed contrary to the good of the Publick which any man had Liberty to question. Which too great power of the Commons, being augmented to Polyb. 6. 49 an intolerable height, by flattering Paralites and Orators, did in after time infinitely wrong Livie 30.6 and obstruct the Carthaginian affaires. Moreover in the Senate there were thirty of the more Gradius Ne-Antient appointed as a supreme Councel, and these had greatest authority with all Men. There powas like wife a Superinfpectour of Manners, invested with the same power as the Roman Cenfors. to maintain publick Decency and Discipline. In processe of time, after many victories, their greatneffe being encreased, they chose a greater Number of Commanders for the War.

Among which Mago, the most Egregious both in courage and fortune, having left behind him two fonnes well educated and instructed in the art of Warre, and they also to their more numerous offspring, as it were by hand, delivering the same skill and knowledg, it was thought fit by some meanes to curbe the too great power of that Family; to this purpose an hundred men were constituted to passe sentence upon the Generals themselves: Their power was very formidable, as for the largenesse of their Commission, so for the continuance, which was during life, whereas even the Kings now, were not for fo long a time but yearly Ariffolia created, whom at home they commonly called Suffetes, that is to fay, Judges, much like to Cornel, Nepos the Roman Conful. But when the Centamovisi or hundred men behaved themselves with much infolence, Hanniball by a Law reduced them into Order, it being decreed, That the Indges Livie 22 22 Bould Yearly be chosen, and that no man sould continue in office two yeares together. Their gods and holy Rites they brought most from Tyrus , some they did afterwards add. Juno they Virgillo. 1 chiefly adored, and Alculapius not a little, in whose honour they erected a Magnificent Strabo b. 17 Temple in the Citie; Apollo's house was likewise very rich, covered with plate of Gold, wherein Apple Puniting was a famous statue which after the Ruine of Carthage was carried to Rome and placed in the great Fluntaioc. t.

Shew-place called Circus Maximus. But to Hercules at Tyrus they every year sent a ship, with Polyh legst. great care well trimmed, with the Tithes of their yearly fruits, and spoiles gotten in War.

From the same Founders also they derived another most horrid Rite, to offer an humane sacri. Diederus fice once a year to Saturne, whom they called Belns; the Relicks of which Barbarous Cruelcy Julin 18.1 could not be quite abolished by the Destruction of the Citie. The other Manners and Customes Historian Islai. of the Citie were more civilized by their conveniency of Commerce and Traffick, to which be- 6,46 ing by nature, and Education from their Forefathers much addicted, they did apply all their Plin. 26.5.37 fludies and Counfels. Hence by an unavoidable mischief the Love of Riches corrupted their Friensbemius Courts of Justice, made Vertue a servant to money, inflamed the Peoples minds with Covetousneffe, and infected them with a fordid custom of Cheating and Lying, forcing the Commonwealth Arisi. Polinck. wholly to give it felf up to these arts. Insomuch as it came to passe that as little Faith was had in Carthaginian Contracts and Covenants, to the chiefest part of the publick strength consisted in Giero contra flaips, their Infantry the main support and pillar of all Empires, was had in no Request, Their Poub 6.43 Horsein very little: As often as they waged War by Land, they made use of Mercenaries, who Polyba.67 had no true Love to the Commonwealth, whose faith was to be bought with money, their discord troublesome, and their conspiracies pernicious. Which error was so Capital, that before the Polyba, 65 utter destruction of the City, no other enemy but those did ever bring them so near to final ruine.

Neither did a leffer crop of mifery fpring from this, That their Magistrates and Publick Officers did by mutual connivance exercise Extortion and Purloin the state without punishment; so that 'tis the leffe to be wondred, that a war arifing between these two Cities, the Romans proved conquerors, when as the Senators in all hard times added their wealth to the publick flock, and Livie 33.32 the Carthaginians made a gain of the Commonwealth. But these vices grew up together with the City, so that at first being weak and little they were prety well born withal, afterward for a while the greatness of their Empire, and the singular virtue of their Commanders made them the leffe fenfible, by whose means chiefly, I find, was both obtained and established the happiness that ever attended Carchage. Their first beginning in Arms was against the Affricans, Justinius 19.1 requiring Tribute for the ground the City was built on; neither could they extort that right out of their hands but by many battels: hereby they enlarged their Empire, and the best planted 11/14 19 part of Africa was reduced into subjection to them. Their command of the feas gave them fair opportunity of passing over into Sardinia and Sicily; the one was rude and Barbarous, not able to refilt, into the other they were invited by its Beauty and Fertility, which was, by reason of the Inhabitants perpetual discords exposed to the injuries of the most Potent. Out of Sardinia into Cerfica their passage was short, and they did the more easily possess the Island as being not very rich.

The Supplement of Livie, Book VI.

But in Sicily for a long time they fought with various Fortune, obtaining many victories, and receiving many overthrows: Amilcar the fon of Hanno when he had carried over three hundred thouland men, was vanquished by Gelo and slain. With which calamity being terrified. the Carchaginians did abstain from Sicily, till being called over by the Ægestans, who were oppressed by the Selmuncians, they sent thither Annibal the son of Gesco the son of Amilear; he deitroying Selinuns and Himera, did again encrease the Carthaginians power in Sicily. Imileo did at fea vanquish Lepris the brother of Dionyfius the elder, and the Sicilians Admiral, he took and funk an hundred thips, and flew above twenty thousand men, he surprised many Cities, and took also part of Syracuse, but a sudden Pestilence arising, which consumed most part of his Army, forced him to return home with very few men. Neither did they yet despair of gaining Sicily, but in few years after fent out Hanno with a fleet, commanding him to fight Diony fine. Afterward Mago being invited by Icetas, when he was in the City of Syracuse it self with threescore thousand foot, he was cast out by Timoleon; afterward the same Timoleon in a very great battel overcame Annibal and Amilear, having in their army feventy thousand men, and forced their Camps likewise. But they had not a quicker and greater turne of fortune in any war then in that against Agathocles, who being beaten in Sicily, besieged in Syracuse, having no manifest hopes of fafety, did yet of his own accord carry the war over into Africa, where having overcome the Carthaginians in many battels, and caused the Libyans every where to rerevolt, he brought them into very great danger and fear; and returning home again he expelled them clearly out of Sicily; till at length the death of the King, and the confusions which followed uponit, again gave them hopes, and opened them a way to regain possession. After this (as we have faid) they variously fought with Pyrrhus, proving at length to be the superi-

In the mean time some Cities also in Spain became Tributary to them, whether being called to the afliftance of the Gaditanes against some oppressing Neighbours, they sent relief to their Kinsmen (for Gades likewise was founded by the Tyrians) and reduced some adjacent Regions of Spain into their own Jurisdiction. This was the posture the Carthaginian affairs were in when they took up arms against the Romans. But the Syraculans and their King Hiero posses fed the greater part of Sicily which was not subdued by the Carthaginians; the residue was held by the Mamertines. They while they were in League with the Roman Legion at Rhegium, and could have affiltance from them, were not content to fecure their own Territories, but invaded those of the Syracusans and Carthaginians, forcing many Cities to pay Tribute to them toavoid plunder, wastings of their grounds, and other incommodities of war. But when Rhegiums was taken, and their companions worthily executed, being bereaved of that help, they were not able to uphold their former greatnesse; and having lost what foever they held out of Mej-fana, were now at war with Hiero for the City it self. Concerning which King Hiero, I think it not inconvenient fomewhat at large to discourse, because he in these times being first an enemy to the Romans, afterward for many years a companion and friend, was of very great moment in the fetling of affairs. For in him was found fingular happiness, great virtue, and most eminent wifdom; and in those dayes the power and state of Syracuse did with him flourish and with him

This man not being helped forward by any wealth or glory left by his Ancestors, owed all his fortune to himself, promoted from a low estate to vast power, not as many, by accusing great men, or by the slaughter and banishment of his opposers, but by wonderful modelty both in attaining and in exercifing his power, as well knowing there is no Kingdom fo well and firmly established, as that which is in such a manner order'd, that it more concerns the Subjects to sear the loss of it then the Prince. Having reigned therefore four and fifty years, in such a time when two most potent Cities on each hand did with most sharp contentions, fight for the dominion of the world, troubled with no War abroad (unlesse in his first year) nor assaulted by any Treason at home, he died being above ninty years old, his senses being at that age entire and his body sound, as a certain argument of his Temperance, being not only beloved by his own people, but had in great Estimation both with the Romans and Grecians; when he would often have divested himself of the Principality, the Citizenes did openly prohibite him; And his fon Gelon, who, at above fifty years of age, died before him, did all his lifetime, even to the last, with constant faith and obedience honour him, shewing a rare example of Moderation, in that he chose rather for ever to want a Kingdom then lose his Father. This Hieron was by his Father Hierocles (who derived his Pedigree from Gelon an antient Tyrant of Sicily) expoled to the mercy of the world; for as much as he being a Noble man was shamed to bring up a child which he had begotten on a servant. But being delititute of all human succour, the Bees for many days fed him, puting honey into his mouth as he lay upon the ground, Hierocles being much affected with this Prodigie, and the answers of the Southsayers, who affirmed, That hereby Kingly power was pre-fignified, took home the Infant, acknowledged it for his own, and in hopes of his future great- Scarnes Sarifneffe took diligent care for his Education. As he was learning his book among his equals, "tis buritufit de nue reported, that a Wolf fuddenly appearing in the midft of the boyes took his book out of his 6. Carlitium. hand. When he first entred into the Wars, 'ris said, An Eagle pitch'd upon his shield, and an 4 of mins of the war which was thought a signe of wisdom and strength, and by reason of the Kingly bird, of highest honour and dignity. But he himself shortly gave more certaine evidence, being of exceeding comelinesse and strength of body, but much more illustrious and beloved for his wir, Temperance, Gentlenesse, Justice and Moderation; having often fought fingle Combates fometimes in the Battel, fometimes against private Challengers, he was alwayes Victour, and by Pyrrbus frequently rewarded with many Military Gifts for his valour; and Pyrrhus his Kinswoman Neress was afterward married to Gelon the fon of Hiero. Pyrrhus Pauliniaib 6. being driven out of Sicily, when (according to the ill temper of those times) a diffension #1/11 in 28.3 arose between the army and Citie of Syracuse, Artemidorus and Hiero were, in the Camp neer Polyb. 1.8 Mergana, by fuffrage of the fouldiers chosen Commanders. By the advice of Hiero, and the help of his friends, some souldiers being privily sent into the Citie reduced it into their Power; where Hiero shewed himself a gallant Man, and fit for the government of any Realme whatfoever; For, of the feveral factions which were therein, he neither flew nor banished any one Man, but by his elemencie, Moderation and upright Counsel so compounded their differenes, Fust nus 13.4. that he was chosen Pretor of Syracuse with the good will and affection even of those against Polybins whom he came, as much as of those men who invited him thither. He with his whole heart as fincerely tendring the publick good as his own (having observed an ill Custome of a long flanding in Sicily, That the General could no fooner lead his forces out of the City but there was either some sedition raised in the Army, or some innovation made at home) began to confult with himself, In whose hands to entrust the City when he should be forced to go out to War. He married therefore the daughter of Leptis, who was very popular, of great authority among the Citizens, of eminent honesty and faithful to his trust.

Having thus provided for Domestick affairs, he devised a remedy (very necessary indeed, but not altogether praise-worthy) against the infolency of the mercenary fouldiers . For drawing out his army against the Mamertines when they met him near Centuripe, he order'd his battel near the River of the Cyamofians with fuch art, that he left a good distance between the Citizens and the Mercenaries, then commanding the Mercenaries to begin the fight, as if he and the City forces would on some other side Charge the enemy while they were already busied. The Mercenaries by this means being furrounded by the greater number of Mamertines, were flain; himself (having thus employed the enemy) marched fair and softly with his other forces to Sy-

Having in this manner purged the Army of those who were ill disposed and enclined to sedition, he diligently Traineth his City forces, hireth new Auxiliaries, and now having the goodwill of all (the most insolent being removed and the rest not daring to murmure) he order'd the Government according to his own pleasure. In the mean while, the Mamertines proud of their late victory and grown more fierce, rashly, and without fear invaded and spoiled the Syracusan Teritories. Hiero now confiding both in the City and Army, forthwith marcheth out Diodori Eclog. against them, and pitcheth his Camp near the enemies City, almost empty by reason of having b.22 fent out every way so many Troops. The Mamertines understanding the danger, suddenly return home to the relief of their City, with all their forces joyned. Hiero removing his Camp out of the Mamertine Fields, taketh the City of Mila, and in it fifteen hundred fouldiers; thence gaining by the way some Castles, he marcheth to Ameselum (which is seated in the midst between Agyrium and Centurina) which (though it were well fenced, and protected by a strong Garrison) he forced and demolished, the souldiers he received into pay, and caused to fight under him; the grounds he divided between the Centuripines and Agyrines. Being animated with this fuccels, he again invaded the Mamertine Teritories, taketh Alefum upon composition, but the Abacenines and Tyndarites voluntary furrender themselves to him. Hereby were the Cities on each hand next to Meffana on both the coasts subject to Hiere, (for the Tindaritans inhabit toward the Etrurian Sea, the Tauromenians, who were at this time in friendship with the Syraculans, toward the Sicilian Sea.) The Mamertines therefore being streightned, fend out their forces under the conduct of Cio their Pretor to oppose the enemy, who now was lodged near the River Longanus in the Mylean fields. The battel being, begun, and the fight along time doubtful, Hiero fuddenly fending in fresh Troops upon the Flank of the Mamertines, made Politicas the Victory his own. For before the fight Hiero had placed together two hundred Messanian Diodorus Exuls, valiant men, who hated the Mamertines, with four hundred choice men of his own Army, commanding them, To go about the hill Thorax, and by a sudden incursion to fall upon the enemy on the other side, which they stoutly performing were the cause why the whole Mamertine Army fell by the fword.

Cio, feeing all lost, and defiring nothing more then to dye, was taken prisoner, fore wounded, and conveyed into the Syraculan campe, finding the Prediction of the Entrailes and Southfayers true in another sense then he expected. For before the Battel the Prophets looking into the Intestines of the sacrifice promised, He should lie in the Enemies Camp that night: Which he effeeming an argument of victory too late found himself deluded by another

Interpretation, with grief and fickness cast down, when the next day among other horses, he espeed that his fon rode upon in the Field, conjecturing thereby his death, he resolutely pulling the cloaths and plaisters off his wounds made way to his own death. The Mamertines, understand. ing their overthrow, grew full of despair, and were now ready to present their humble supplication to the Conquerours, when an unexpected accident prevented them. It happened that at the same time Hannibal, the Carthaginian Pretor, was in the Liparean Islands, which are adjacent to Sicily. He having intelligence of Hiero's Victory, fearing left (the Mamertines being utterly vanquished) the Syracusan power would grow too great for the Carthaginians came fuddenly over under pretence of congratulating with Hiero for his Victory; and hindering him from directly marching to Messana, did himself make first enterance, and when the Mamertines were now ready to yield, did not only possesse them with hopes of retaining their liberty, but left a ftrong Garrison of his own souldiers amongst them. Hiero understanding himself by this crast deluded, & being not sufficiently prepared for a siege, made now more difficult returned to Syracufe, where being received by all with very great joy, he was by an universal acclamation faluted King, which Title he afterward retained with the confent both of the Citizens and others of the Island without.

When Hiero was retreated, the Mamertines having a little space of resuming confidence. began to deliberate upon their present condition, but were divided into two Factions, some thought it not to be diffruted, But that they should commit themselves to the protection of the Carthaginians, which as for many other reasons it was convenient, so having admitted their Gar-'rifon, 'twas little leffe then necessary. On the other fide 'twas faid, 'The Carthaginians were no lesse enemies to the Mamertines then Hiero, that without doubt their purpose of defending of the City was not out of good will, but defire of Dominion; That of a long time they had aspired to the Empire of Sicily, neither were cast down from their bold hopes by losse of Armies and Navies, no not by wars in Africa, and fear of their own ftate at home; That therefore without exception they must prove Vassals if they commit themselves to those who have so strong a Navy, and possesse greatest part of Sicily it self. That tis therefore no way expedient to defire aid from the Carthaginians, a covetous, unfaithful people, who will lay heavier burdens upon them then they could fear from the Syracufans. If the Punick Garrison came only with intent to preferve the City from Hiero, they may now upon fair terms be dismiffed having done the work: But if they have fome other Clandestine delign, it behooveth them with the greater care to prevent the danger of their deceitful friendship. That they should rather implore affiltance from the Romans, as a people invincible, of unquestionable faith and fincerity, who will have neither occasion nor opportunity of keeping Messana under their juriddiction, as having not a foot of ground in Sicily, nor any use of sea affairs, and consequently taking no care therein. That they would be abundantly content to keep Italy fecure from Hiero and the Carthaginians, having made Meffana strong, as an obstacle to their further proceedings. That therefore they should continue to rely upon the Roman faith rather then any other * Nation; that indeed they could neither with honesty or any convenience change their former counsels, having already sent Embassadors and obtained hope of succour and relief. For the Mamertines before their last battel with Hiero, beginning then to distrust in their own strength had craved affiftance of the Romans as their Kinsmen. And the people being perswaded by the Consuls who were desirous of employment in the Wars, had decreed that aid should be sent to them; but the Senate out of shame to be counted authors of the business, did deferit. For they who had lately fo feverely punished their own Legion for the wicked furprize of Rhegium. if they should now assist the Mamertines, who had by the like treachery obtained the mastery of Messana, they saw they should clearly loose the reputation of their Justice and Fidelity, which by their former act they had acquired. But now having heard of the Mamertines overthrow. and not doubting but if they were forfaken by the Romans, they would apply themselves to the Carthaginians, with one confent they ordained to fend them relief. For in the Senate many had before inclined to this opinion, as forefeeing that otherwife Meffana quickly, and not long after all Sicily would come under the Carthaginian power, which if it were once come to passe, they should be forced to fight with the Carthaginians for their own possessions in Italy. For this danger would prove unavoidable, as well by reason of the insatiable desire of Ruloin low were easily overflown, or whether some earthquake or strength of the Tides cut off the C. fidow Va Ifthmer. From hence many think that Town to be called Rhegium, because things which are viarum 12.14 broken, are by fome fuch word nominated in the Greek Tongue. 'Tis therefore very credible that the first inhabitants of Sicily came out of Italy, as may be conjectured by the very name. For the Opici are said to have built a Citie on the adverse shore over against Italy, which he cause it was scituate in a Creek of the sea bearing the figure of a Sythe, they called it, I beleeve, Sicilia, which the Grecians afterward coming, called Zancle, both those words in the several Languages fignifying a Sythe. From thence, as often it happens, the name was derived to the whole Island, Which was by many called both Zancle and Sicilia, This those who are potent, as by the convenient scituation of the places. For Italy, proceeding in a long tract between the two feas from the Ligurians and Venetians, to the Brutians, is there divided from Sicily by a very narrow Channel. For there is no doubt made but that these Regions in old times were a continent, afterward divided by the fea; whether the grounds being

This Island far excelleth all others in the Mediterranean Sea, both in extent of ground, and fruitfulnesse of Soile, yeelding abundance of Oyl and Wine and Corn of the best; adorned with many, and those very great Cities, even to wonder; and if you consider the Commodity of Diedori Ectog. the Havens, and seituation of the whole Island, there is scarce to be sound in the world a place more sit for the chiefe seat of an Empire: For, being near adjacent to Italy, on the contrary part it looketh toward Africa, on another fide lyeth Sardinia, and on east it hath Peloponnefus devided from Gracia by the Ionian fea: On every hand the voyage is short, and the passage eafy for ships whether bound outward or homeward. And truly, though other reasons were alledged, yet the only cause of the War between the Carthaginians and Romans, was, with L. Ampelius out doubt, the great defire each of them had to be Masters of this Island. The Romans found fault, c.46 That the Carthaginians contrary to the league had affisted the Tarentines; the Carthaginians on the other fide charged them, for baving entred into Confaderacy with Hiero against them. But to so great a power were now both these Cities advanced, that it could not be avoided but that at some time or other for some cause they must needs find occasion to fall out. For as Trees planted at no great distance, for a while do not much hinder one the other, but being grown to some bignesse bereave one the other of Juice and nourishment from the earth, and at ful growth enterwinding both root and branches mutually destroy one the other: So rising Empires cannot long be at Amitie and friendship, but, swallowing up what is interjacent between each others Donions, desire to try the superiority between themselves, neither being able to put a limit to their own ambition or to enlarge their Territories without removing all Opponents.

To these causes may be added the great power the Comminalty had in each City, together with their earnest desire of undertaking the War. In Carthage the vulgar fort did much prevail, Aristot, Polis, and now in the encrease of their City, growing rich by many Commodities, were willing for 2.11 gains sake to have war upon war. The condition of the Roman people was not much different Zonaras for having in the former wars sustained damage in their estates, they hoped by the riches of Si- Polyb. 1.11 sily to recompence themselves, and therefore, according to that power they had lately extorted from the Senate, did approve and confirm their fentence who perfivaded the war. Hereby Livie Epkoni, appine the Conful being commissioned (whereas otherwise the major part of the Senate had 16 affented, overpowring the votes of those who stood to old Rules) without delay sendeth Clau- Zonaras. dim a Tribune of fouldiers beforehand with some few thips, to observe an opportunity, and if any were offered, to wast over into Sicily. When he was come to Rhegium, not daring to hazard Aud de viris his ships because he saw the seas obstructed with a greater sleet of Carthaginians, he entred 11111, c. 27 into a Fishermans vessel and crossed over to Messana; there discoursing with the Mamertines as the present occasion required, being not able to overcome the contradiction of the Carthaginians, he returned without having done his bufineffe. But awhile after understanding there was a diffention at Messana, some pleading against the Roman affishance, the greater part bearing ill will to the Carthaginian Garrison, he again croffed the sea, and among other things to the pre-Sent purpole told them, His coming was only to fet the City at liberty, which when he had effected be would immediately return. The Carthaginians answer d, The Romans need not trouble them-Selves for the liberty of a City which was under abeir jurisdiction, the Carthaginians had already out of their good will taken care that the Mamertines should not be compelled to be subject to the Syracusans: That therefore he might depart, or else give some other reason of his being at Messana. Claudius denied, The City was free so long as a Forreign Garrison continued therein

To this when no man returned any answer, the Carthaginians out of pride, the Mamertines for fear holding their peace, he cunningly and readily proceeded, 'Tis plaine, faith he, by this your general silence, that the Carthaginians cause is unjust, and that the Mamertines are degrous of liberty, otherwise neither would the one sorbeare to justifie their own Right, and the e-thers; if they consented with the Carthaginians, having no canse to dissemble, would freely and open! fpeak their minds. At this there arifing a kind of a noife in the affembly, many praifing his speech as true, and indeed agreeing with their inward thoughts; he (thinking he had, for the present, sufficiently moved the Mamertines and tryed the disposition of their minds) went back to Rhegium. And not long after, having made ready his ships, he attempted to passe over; but being much inferiour to the Carthaginian Commanders, both in number of veffels, and skill in sea affairs, and being beaten back by the violence of the Waves, in a udden storme ariling, he returned to his port, having lost some ships, and hardly saving the Rest. But being nothing terrified with this misadventure, he new trinoned his ships, resolving upon a bet-ter opportunity once more to make tryal of Fortune: When behold messengers came from Hanno (Governour of the Mamertine Garrison, and Guardian of the seas) bringing with them all the ships and men which the Carthaginians had taken in the former fray: Hanno's defign herein was to cast the blame of the breach of Covenants upon the Romans, he therefore also complained, That they had by force attempted to sail in those seas which were in the possession of the Carthaginians; and furthermore perswaded them to have a great care of preserving peace and maintaining the league.

But hearing that Claudius would not admit of any conditions unlesse they would withdraw their forces out of Messana, and that again he endeavoured to cross the sea, he vaunted, That he would not suffer the Romans so much as to wash their hands in that sea. Nevertheless he could not prevent Clausius, who observing the Nature of the sea, laid hold of an opportunity when the wind happily helped the Tide, and arrived in Sicily without opposition. There calling a Counsel of those Mamertines he found in the Haven, he perswaded them, To call Hanno to them, as if they had some business at present to consult with him about. For Hanno, not much confiding in the Townsmens doubtful minds, had with the souldiers possessed the Castle neither was he willing to trust himself in any of their Assemblies: Yet fearing if he betrayed his Diffidence he might encrease their complaints, and by his absence give them occasion to joun with the Romans, he came to discourse with them, where the time being spun out with disputation and wrangling, the Romans, with the Mamertines their approbation, laid hands on him and call him into prison. So being circumvented by craft, and frightned with menaces, when no other condition would be accepted, he was compelled to reftore the Mamertines their Caftle and draw away his Garrison. The Carthaginians upon intelligence of the businesse, were above Valer. Maxim. measure exasperated, and (whereas otherwise they used to punish their Commanders for evil counfels though they prospered) exclaiming both against the folly and cowardize of Hanna, miserably crucified him, and immediately sent both sea and land forces to Messana with another Hanno, the ion of Hannibal, to order affairs in Sicily: He drawing his forces together at Li-

Diodori Eclog. Ishaum, marched to Selinuns, where pitching his Camp, he left his foot army and went to Agrigentum, and (having fenced the Castle there) he drew the people, being friends to the Carthaginians, into arms against the Romans: From whence being returned to his Camp, Embas.

fadours came to him from Hiero, who being no whit content with the Romans arrival into Sicily, Polib. . 11 thought this the fittelf feason wherein joyning forces for a time with the Carthaginians, both they and also the Barbarians in possession of Messana might be driven out of Sicily. Having therefore had discourse with the Carthaginian General, they easily agreed to enter into consederacy against the Romans, who had supplanted both to their equal losse, each of them having Diodori Eclos failed of their hopes of Messana: 'twas ordered they should joyntly besiege Messana, and suffer no pare of Sicily to be subject to any power but the Carthaginians or Syracusans. So the Carthaginian Commander with his wholestrength moved against the Mamertines, having first sent. an Herauld to charge the Romans, If they would be effectmed friends of the Carthaginians to depart

Messana, and within a time prefixed to quit Sicily. The ships were commanded to keep their station about Peloras; the soot army fortised their Camp at a place not far from Messana, called Cubilia, in the Greek toungue 'Euval. Hiero likewise, according to agreement, came with his Syracusant Army, and laid siege to the Citie on the other side, about the Hill Chalcidicus, so the Citie, being round begirt, could not safely receive succour either by land or sea. About the same time, when the Herauld brought back no peaceful answer from Meffana, the Carthaginians, partly out of anger, partly out of diffruer, cruelly put to death all their Dissort Eclog. Mercenary fouldiers which were Italians by Nation. These things were no sooner heard at Reme, but the Conful Appins was forthwith fent with a ftrong Army to Registm, thence he fent some before, to treat with the Carthaginians and Hiero about breaking up the siege, in the mean time, seeing the seas so strongly guarded, he was very solicitous and intent in contriving how to cross over with the least danger. The Consul's Embassadours brought back no friendly answer

Dielori Ecicg. from the Carthaginians, but were by Hiero with an accurate oration sharply reprehended, he first having recounted the many good offices he had done the Romans, proceed saying, 'I am 'in doubt, Romans, whether I should grieve for my self or for you; I indeed have lost friends of 'you somewhat worse then I took you to be, but ye have lost that Reputation of Justice and Integrity for which ye were so famous among all Nations. With the Mamertins ye never had any friendship or society, ye had heretofore League with the Carthaginians, and lately entred into one with Me. Being now willing to breake these Leagues, can ye give an account, by what 'injury from us, or merit of the Mamertines ye are thereunto provoked? But because the *Carthaginians are able to speake for themselves, omitting what concerneth them, I shall at pre-pidari Eclog, sent put you in mind of things in reference to my self alone. The Mamertines your good

Country men, did, as you know, receive pay under the Syracusan Banners, and being dis-' miled for their Returne for Italy, after they had been entertained as freinds and Companions by the poore credulous Messenians, committed a most horrid fact, as hath not been remembred by man, flaying in the night time their Land-lords, and keeping in their own power, their goods, wives, children and the Citie it felf. Which unlesse your selves (being of the same opinion with other men) had judged to be a most vile and execrable villany, you would not so severely have punished the self same fact of the Campanians committed upon the Rhegians, by the Mamertines Example. By the same indignitie therefore wherewith ye were moved to take revenge of wicked villanies, by the same am I moved not to let the Mamertines goe unpunished, especi-'ally feeing they have fince committed fo many Robberies almost all Sicily over, burying as it were the memory of their first offence with others afterward committed. For (to omit other things) in that they destroyed the Cities of Camarina and Gela, then under the Syracusan prote-Ction, is reason sufficient why I should with a Just and pious War prosecute the boldnesse of such 'most impudent Men. If ye therefore undertake to defend them because, being born in the fame lials, they are as it were your kinfmen, how much more justly might you have spared the Rhegians which were your fellow-Citizens? When in the taking of Rhegium I helped 'you with Auxiliaries and Provisions, how should I possibly then Divine that ye would hereafter

'hinder me when I should upon as just causes besiege Mellana? But what need I use many words? if you have any care lest of your reputation and faithfulnesse, if any sense of honesty, at least if any shame. I ought not to doubt but that you will with your forces rather assist me in my just cause then oppose me. But if the consideration of these things seem light unto you, however the event of war be doubtful, 'tis most certain all the world will plainly understand, That the Romans were incited to bare arms against us, not out of any colour of Justice and Equity, not by any injuries received (for that ye can no way pretend) not out of any pity or good will to the Mamertines, but meerly by their own ambition, and inordinate defire of adding this Noble Island to their Empire.

When this answer was returned, Appius having observed that so strong a Navy guarding the passage he could not without manifest danger cross over, plotted a very subtil and cunning device. he faid. He did by no means defire that Hiero should be alienated from the Romans, that the Frontinus war was not decreed against him, neither could be projecuted without the peoples command. At a strategem 1.4 day therefore appointed he commanded his Sea-men to be ready, having their ships prepared for the voyage as if he would fail home. Now he was not ignorant that there were many both Carthaginian and Syracufan fouldiers in the Rhegian Port, under the pretence of being Merchants, by whom he thought this news would quickly be conveighed to those who would have it true. And it hapned accordingly as he had foreseen, for he no sooner had entred into his ships on a clear Sun-shinie day, and sailed along the Italian shore, but presently news was carried to the Carthaginian fleet which guarded the feas, whereupon they now not fearing the enemy would make any attempt that way, left the paffage open, failing themselves likewise away whither it pleased them. The Conful, who had forethought it would so come to passe, steared his course backward in the Zonaras night time, and arrived in Sicily with his whole Navy, no body so much as observing, nuch leffe hindring his coming.

It was a bold Enterprize and full of hazard, for an army unskilful in fea-affaires, in the night time, blindly to venture with rude and illbuilt ships through a sea dangerous in it self, polyb,1,12 though it had not been dark, nor any enemie to be feared: And the exploit was thought worthy to be made known to Posterity, by a new Cognomen thereupon given to the Conful. For, because he made use of many vessells, made of the Trunks of trees, for the transportation of his senced de Beer fouldiers, he was, in admiration of the fact, by the simplicity of that age sirnamed Candex, vira.c.1 which fignifieth the trunk of a tree. For the Romans having no use of sea affairs, had neither Polyb. 1.20 any covered thip or long boate, or good skiff in a bufineffe of fuch concernment as this was: but made use of those Triremes which the Tarentines and Locrians had lent the Eleats and Neapolitans, together with little vessels of Traffick of fifty Oars. But Appins landing not far from Zonaras the place where the Syracusans had pitched their Camp, Encouraged his souldiers and declaring to them, The Viltory would be certain if they came upon the Enemy unawares, immediately proceeded to affault their Camp. Hiero being awakened with the sudden tumult, marched out with what forces were ready; for a time the fight was very sharp, the Roman horsemen were beaten back, but the Legions floutly standing to it, Hiero was overthrown, and with his men Polybins 1.12 fearfully retreated into his works. Appius having commanded the dead bodies to be plunder'd, entred into Messana, freeing the Mamertines from great sear, and filling them with better hopes for hereaster. Hiero seeing himself beaten before he could see the enemy (as himself asterwards Zonaras confessed) and suspecting that the Carthaginians had betrayed the passage over the sea, when Florus he had revolved many things in his doubtful mind, began to be in fear of the main chance and in Diodori Eclog. the dead time of the next night he drew his army out of their Trenches, and marched directly Pelyb. 1, 12 without halting to Syracuje. When he was gone, Appine thought fit to make use of the terror zonars of his late Victory in vanquishing the Carthaginans also, and having ordered his souldiers to Pophius. refresh themselves in time, marched out in the dawning of the day to assault the Carthaginian Camp, which was pitched in a very fafe place, by nature and art diligently fenced, for on one fide the fea, on the other fide deep Marishes and Bogs encompassed it in the form of a Tenin. Zonaras fula: That narrow space of ground where was passage to firm land was senced with a strong wall against all assaults. Here the Roman souldiers beginning the storm, could not prevail against the strength of the place and multitude of defendants, but being beaten back with darts and stones (as in the storm of a City) they were forced to retire without having done their

Many times it hapneth in war that ill success in the beginning giveth occasion of better fortune, while they who are worsted endeavour with better advice and more courage to make up their loffe, and the enemy on the other fide being bewitched with a flattering opinion of felicity, and taking no heed against suture chances, are carried away with rashnesse, as at this time it came to passe to the Carthaginians, for they not being content to have repulsed the enemies, issued out of their Camp and pursued them as if they had fled, thinking the Romans had yielded not so much to the difficulty of the place, as to their virtue and courage.

When therefore they were come out of their works, the fortune of the fight changed with the place, and a great number of them were flaine, fome fled into the Camp, others as they had convenience into the Cities round about; neither durst they any more stir out of their painting. time to be spent in vaine thereabouts; leaving a strong Garrison at Messaud, Invaded the Territories of the Syracusans and their Confederats; and having without opposition wasted the Grounds, he conceived such Confidence, that he marched up with his army even to Syracuse it felf: Where the Battel was very doubtful, and at one time the Conful was in great danger and had certa nely been furrounded and taken, had he not fuddenly bethought himfelf and fent to Hiero, to treat on Conditions of peace. Hiero likewife fent a friend of his to confult about the businesse, and the discourse being on purpose drawn out in length, the Cousul had time to bring his men into a place of greater fecurity: The Syracusans likewise following the same example, had many trevites of peace with the Romans, and indeed an agreement had been mide, but that Hirro was unwilling to be the author thereof. In these affaires the greater part of the year was spent; then the Consul returned to Messana, where leaving some forces to protect the Mamertines, with the rest of his men he crossed over to Rhegiam: From thence he went to Eutropius b. 2 Rome to his Triumph which he made, over the Carthaginians and Hiero King of Sicily, with great joy of the People, as being the first over a Forreign Nation. This was the first of the Romans delignes by fea, and such was the successe of their undertakings in Sicily. But these things and the actions of following times are much corrupted by the ambition of writers, the cheife whereof, Philinus Agrigentinus, and Fabius Pillor, the one striving to advance the Carthaginians Glory, the other the Romans, they both neglect their duty, and the truth of History; Whose Levity Polybins deservedly reprehends. For if even in private causes it be held an accursed Crime to circumvent any one by falfe Testimony; the author of an history is certainely to be effeemed more fouly perfidious if he corrupt the acts of Princes and Commonwealths with falshood: He ought to value truth more then any earthly Commodity or his own life, and the leffe deserveth pardon in that he cannot alledge so much as any faire pretence for his Lyes, for if he durst not for some causes freely speak all he knew, he might certainely without danger 1 ivie Ephon, have held his Tougue. While Claudius in Sicily vanquisheth Hiero and the Carthaginians, 16 M. Fulvius the other Consul bringeth the Volsinian siege to an Issue, having to deale with men who by despair were hardned and made valiant against all violence, he at length tameth them by famine. Upon delivery of the City, he did with exquisite torments put to death that unthankful and insolent crew of Libertines; the City it self he demolished, the other Volinia ans who had not put off the faith of fervants, and reverence toward their mafters, he distributed

This war was likewise thought worthy of a Triumph, which the Conful made in the Calends of November, as over the Volinians. While the same Consuls were in office a Lustration was performed by the Cenfors, Cn. Cornelius and C. Marcius, and there were registred the names of two hundred ninety two thousand, two hundred twenty and four Citizens; a very great and almost incredible number to one who shall consider how many were lost in the wars, which hardly ever ceased since the foundation of the City; and how many were also swallowed up by the Pestilence and Malignant diseases as raging as the war it felf. But indeed the Commonwealth was made invincible and not to be overcome by any calamity or flaughter whatfoever, by the wife advice of Romalus (which was constantly observed by posterity) in daily admitting new people into their City, infomuch that neither all the loffes received by Pyrrhus, nor their many shipwracks in the first Punick war, nor the fights of Thrasimene and Canna in the second, were able so much to afflict it, but that fill she did rise more chearful, free and valiant out of all her trou-

when in the Leuctrian battel they loft not much more then a thousand men, their Empire prefently fell to the ground; and at Sellafia with the loffe of not quite fix thousand, their Liberty was taken away. But the Achaens, inhabitants of the same Peloponnesus, admitting freely any neighbours into equal priviledges with themselves, did constitute a very fair and flourishing Commonwealth, and likely to have continued, had not some few of them, to their own and Juflimub. 34 their Countries destruction, madly provoked the Romans, whose power then was grown formidable to all people. Such divers events are necessarily consequent to divers institutions: For as in nature it is agreeable, that those bodyes who are to a competent measure daily refreshed with wholfe me food, should be stronger and longer lived then those who content with their own natural ingenite moisture despise all nourishment from without : so it stands to reason, that those Cities should better flourish, who admit into themselves and make their own what in any other place they find to be excellent, then those, who by a foolish arrogance, despising whatsoever groweth not in their own foil, deprive themselves of many good affistants in obtaining and preferving their power and foveraignty.

This year gave a beginning to a cruel custom, which afterward was frequently and most intemperately usurped. That the blood of man should become a public special of pleasure, being profuely shed for the sake of any mean and wanton speciator. The authors of this batha-Li it Epirom. rous custome were M. and D. Junius Brutus, who by a strange kind of piety, intending to honour the Ashes of their dead father, did with great savour of the Citizens exhibit a Fencing-Shew. But this injury to mankind was most severely revenged by a Pestilence, which all this and the next year did furiously rage. Concerning which when they had consulted the books of Orofina the Sybills, 'twas found the anger of the gods was the cause thereof. There arising therefore a sufpition that their Religious affairs were nor rightly handled, the Priests by diligent observation on and inquifition, found that many Chappels and Temples were converted into the use of prion and inquinition, round that many chappers and 1 empires were converted into the use of principles and that Capparonia, a Veltal Nun, was guilty of Incest; she prevented her doom by Orofilia hanging her felf, but he who had corrupted her, together with those servants who were privy to the fact, were executed according to Law. The holy places were redeemed out of private hands to their wonted use. So having cleared the City in matters of Religion, the Fathers applied their minds again to the care of the Commonwealth; and because Etraria being appeared, there was no commotion in Italy, they ordered both the new Confuls to be fent into Sicily Zonaras with their Legions: the Consuls were M. Valerius Maximus the eldest son of Marous, who in the time of his office was called Meffalla, and M. Offacilius Crassus, C.F. M.N. These Fabula Remahaving fafely transported their forces were attended with the same good fortune. For when af- na. ter their taking the City of the Adranites by ftorm they had laid fiege unto [enturipa, there came Embassadors to them from the Alæsines, offering to deliver up their town.

forces joyned, sometimes asunder, as they saw cause, overcoming both Carthaginian and Syracusan, as often as they durst stand to the hazard of a Battel, spread their same and Terrour round about: And such was their happinesse in following their fortune, and so great their force, that in a while after their were reckoned fixty feven Cities which had committed themfelves to their Protection, in which number were the Tauromenitans and the Catangeans: Out of which Cities the Confuls leavying what Auxiliaries they pleafed. did daily increase in strength, and, pitching the Camp neere unto Syracufe it felf, confulted about the fiege of it. Which Diodorus thing Hiero maturely confidering, when he began to distrust in his own and the Carthaginian Polyb. 1.16 Forces, and withal thought the Romans were best to be trusted, he resolved to enter into Paulan book 6 League with the Romans, and in order thereunto fent Embassadours to the Consuls to treate of Peace. Neither were the Romans at all averse from making freindship with Hiero to separate Diodori Eclog. him from the Carthaginians, especially because thereby they might more easily supply their Legions with Corne for food. For the Carthaginians having command of the seas, they could not polybine have Provision from Italy, by which incommodity the former Conful reaped more trouble then from the enemy, But, when Hiero was once united to them, the Kingdome of Syracuse being very fruitful, would plentifully afford them all Necessaries. The Peace therefore was coning very fruitiul, would plentitully amord them all Necessates. The Peace therefore was son-cluded on these Articles, That what places or prisoners Hiero had taken from the Romans or their Polybias affociates he should restore without ransome, and likewise pay as hundred Talents of silver; that he Disdort Eclog. Bould without molestation raigue over Syracuse and all Cities under the Syracusans furifdition, 12 the chief whereof were Acra, Leontium, Megara, Elorus, Netini, Tauromenium. The Coulebon in Embaffadours being thence fent to Rome, the fame Conditions were there confirmed, and the Polyh Senate decreed that Peace should be maintained with that King, and after a few dayes Cn. Hannibal the Carthaginian, being come as far as Xiphonia Disdorus with his fea forces, to raife the fiege of Syracufe, having intelligence of the Peace, returned. with greater haft then he came. The Romans being now strengthned by Hiero their affociate Polybins. and fellow fouldier, made no delay, but quickly reduced many Cities from the Carthaginian Jurisdiction. From Adranon , a fenced village , and Macella , after many dayes fiege they Dioderus returned without effecting their Purpole : But the Segestans they received into protection when Zonaras they had flaine the Carthaginian Carrifon and voluntarily revolted to them: Among other Gicero Verria. And not long after the Alienzans came into the Romans, But at Hilarus, Territus and Alcelus they were faine to use force and Engines, and there-zonars. fore dealt the more severely with the vanquished party. Whereupon the Tyndaritans, being terrified, feeing themselves next to danger, and help far from them, Borred into Confultation about yielding themselves to the Romans, but were prevented by the Carthaginians; for they, fufpeding what was in hand, fent away the cheife of the Citie as Hoftages to Litheum, and took in good store of Corne and wine and other provisions. About this time the severity of O. Hacilino Craffus the Conful was of much advantage to the Roman Discipline, for those fouldiers who being taken by Hannibal, had basely, for safeguard of their lives, submitted themselves to bondage, he caused to continue without the Camp to receive the first charge from the enemy, that Frontinus strs. fo, having no fence but their own courage, they might be the more valiant, trufting only in their 4 1 own courage, and not to any fecurity of the place they stood in. After thele and other exploits of no greater moment, winter now approaching, the Confuls Zoniras, disposing several Garrisons in convenient places, returned into Italy and so to Rome with the re-fidue of their Armies. There was a Triumph decreed to CM. Valerius (whose successe and Festi Capitolic pains had been most remarkable) over the Carthaginians and Hiere, which was performed the ni fixteenth of the Calends of April. Among the spoils was brought a Clock, which is therefore taken notice of, because it was the first which was seen at Rome; it was taken at Catina, and by Valerius placed upon a Pillar in publick near the Rostra: He also on the side of the Court built by Hoffilius fet up a Table, whereon was painted the Battel wherein he overcame Hiero and the Carthaginians, which before his time was not done by any man, but afterward by many. This Valerins had his Sirname Meffalla from Meffana; but I wonder that fome Authors of no small Pars a puddle note should imagine it was derived from his taking that City, whereas the series of a stairs do not should imagine it was derived from his taking that City, whereas the series of a stairs do not should be series as the series of a stairs and the series of a stair and the series it sustained (after Appins Clandius his departure) from the Carthaginians and Hiero, removing the one enemy and reconciling the other.

In the mean while the Pestilence still rageing, a Dictator was named for the knocking in of a Nail, who was Cn. Fulvius, Cn.F. Cn.N. Maximus Centumalus, he chose for Master of the Horse 2. Marcius. 2.F. 2.N. Philippus. In the same year the Esernian Colony was planted whereas the year before one was deduced to Firmum, or as some will have it to Castrum. After this L. Posthumins, L.F. L.N. Megellus, and Q. Mamilius, Q.F. M.N. Vitulus were created Confuls, and both of them had Sicily allotted for their Province: There were but two Legions allowed them, which were thought sufficient, because now having Amity with Hiero the war was more easie; they considered likewise that provisions would be the better procured is the Army were but small. The Confuls having transported their forces into Sicily, and being joyned with their affociates, paffing by things of leffer moment, thought fit with their whole ftrength to befiege Agrigentum, which City the Carthaginians had plentifully furnished with all manner of accommodations, intending it for the Magazine of their wars. For they feeing Hiero had for faken them, and that the Romans made Sieily their chiefest care, they thought it behooved them to make the more diligent preparation for the war. In the first place therefore they fent the greater part of their forces into Sardinia, to lie in wait against the Italian shore . by that means to divert the Romans from Sicily, or at least to compel them to fend the smaller forces then otherwise they would have done.

But being frustrated of their hopes (for the Romans had strength sufficient, both wherewith to guard their own Coasts, and invade Sicily with a new army) they hired many Mercenary fouldiers of the Ligurians and Gauls, but more out of Spaine, whom, together with great plenty of provisions, they fent to Agrigentum; resolving to make that their Magazine of Corne, and the Receptacle of their Armies; being, by reason of its conveniency of scituation, and multitude of buildings, fitter for fuch occasions then any other Citie of Sicilie of their Jurisdiction. The onely feat of War therefore being about that Citie, the Romans, having confined the Carthaginians within their works, pitched their Camp within a mile thereof. The grain was then ripe in the fields, and because they foresaw the siege would prove long, the souldiers fent out to reape and bring in Corne, wandred somewhat too far and more carelessly then ought to have been done having an enemy so near. The Carthaginians omitted not to make ule of this occasion, and had indeed given a great overthrow to the Romans, but that they regained as much by their courage, as they had lost by their negligence. For when they who were fent out to forrage were not able to resist the assault of the Enemy, the Carthaginians pursued them even to the Camp, where deviding their forces, some prepared to storme the workes, while the others maintained the fight with the guards without. Then, as often at other times, the Laws of warfare duely observed and the incorrupted Rigour of the Roman Discipline saved them from an hazard tending to the destruction of their whole army. For (it being a deadly crime among the Romans for any cause whatsoever to forsake their station) the guard without knowing it was to no pupole to fly back, though they were much overpowred in number, maintained the fight with wonderful courage, losing many of their own men, but killing more of the enemies, till the Troupes had time to arme themselves and some to their Relief, so the Enemie being there repulied, and those who had now almost entred the workes surrounded, the Romans made a very great ilaughter of them, and purfued the rest even to the Citic. This accident made both the Enemie more fearful of Isluing out, and the Romans more wary in their Forrage. Henceforth the heat of their Contention being not so great as before, (for the Carthaginians feldom made a fally, and then only in manner pickeering and light skirmish)the Romans thought fit to divide their forces, and plant their Campson two fides of the Citie, on the one fide near to Asculapius his Temple, on the other in the high way leading to Heracles. Their Camps were fenced with Trenches on both fides, toward the Citie, against their Sallies, and toward the Country both to fecure themselves from any invasion, and to hinder Relief from entering the Citie. The space between the two Camps was guarded with many companyes of soul-

In all these affaires they were much affisted by the Sicilans, who lately had made friendship with them, of whom together with the Romans there were an hundred thousand; They brought provisions as far as Erbeffus, from whence (it being not far off) the Romans fetched it into their Campe. Whereby they had very great plenty of all Necessaries. At this stay the siege continued for almost five moneths, neither much prevailing over the other (for they attempted nothing but light skirmishes) till at length the Carthaginians began to have the worst on't. For a great number of men, little leffe then fifty thousand warriers, having been so long that up in one town, had spent almost all their corn, and saw no likelyhood of procuring more, the Romans guarding all the paffages; fo that they were much afflicted both with their present mi-

ferie, and expectation of future. Therefore Hannibal the fon of Gefco (who was Commander in chief at Agrigentum) by many meffengers craving relief against hunger and other dangers, Hanno the elder was fent into Sicily with some Elephants and Souldiers which were for that pur- Palibins pole railed. His Army confifted of fifty thousand foot, fix thousand horse, and threescore E- Diodori Eclog. lephants, with which forces he failed to Lilybaum, thence he marched to Heraslea, whither forth- b.23 with came messengers promising to deliver up Erbessus to him: Being by their means made master of Erbessus (from whence the Romans hitherto had all their provisions) he seemed to have essengers. cted a bufinesse of great moment, as much afflicting the Romans now for want of necessaries as they had done the Agrigentines.

And now the Romans began to confult about railing the fiege, which they were very near giving over for a desperate business, had not the King of Spracuse, by trying all waves, made a shift by stealth to convey to them some corn and other commodities, whereby their present want was in some measure relieved. Hanno considering the Romans now to be faint with hunger and other infirmities following it, whereas his own men were well and lufty and in perfect ftrength, approached near the Romans, refolving, if occasion were offered, to fight them. Marching therefore with his fifty Elephants, and whole army from Heracles, he sends his Numidian hortmen before to play about the enemies Camp, to provoke the Roman hoffmen, and, if possible, to draw them out into ambush. The Numidians according to order carelessely slying about the Consul's Camp, the Romans iffue out, beat back those who opposed, and pursued them as they fled out of order, that way which they knew Hanno to be coming. The further they followed the pursuit, the more difficult was their return to their own works, infomuch that many of them were lost after they had met with fresh forces, which caused those who fled likewise to turn and fight. Hanno being by this much encouraged with hopes of the main Victory, placeth himself upon an hill called Torse, about a mile and a half distance from the Roman Camp; nevertheleffe the battel was deferred longer then was expected between two Armies fo near one the other; fometimes the Carthaginian, fometimes the Roman unwilling to hazard their whole fortune in one battel; while Hanno was defirous to fight, the Romans contained themselves within their Trenches, because they were exceeded by the enemy both in number and chearfulnesse, being themselves terrified and dejected with the losse their horsemen had sustained. But when they, (feeing their affociates troubled and daunted at this their fear, the Enemy on the contrary grow more confident, and thinking it better to fight with the Carthagin ans then endure fuch want) were refolved upon the Battel, then Hanno began to fear, and decline the encounter. Two months were thus frent; nothing of greater moment being performed, but Polybina light skirmishes which happened every day. At length, being moved with frequent entreatics from Hannibal, who had daily fent out Messengers, and by lighted fires given him often no-tice, That the besieged were no longer able to endure hunger, and that many were thereby compelled to flee to the enemy; Hanne was resolved no longer to defer the battel, giving or- zenaras compelled to fee to the enemy; Hanno was reloved in longer to deter the batter, giving vo- 2000 and der to Hannibel at the fame time to iffue out of the City. The Confush having intelligence here- Promining Read of, kept themselves very quietly within their Camps; Hanno the more furroully prefents him - 2.1 self in Battel array, marcheth up to their very Works, boldly provokes them to fight, reproaching them with fear and cowardize. They on the contrary being content to repulse the enemy from their Traches, neither ranged batter against them while they shood, nor pursued them when they retreated. When things had been thus transacted for some dayes together, and the Carthaginians were fully perswaded the Romans durft not venture on any further action, L. Postbusing the Conful wifely made use of the enemies security and contempt to his own good. For filently ordering his whole battel within the works, when the Carthaginians according to their custome came up to the works, he issued out with a few and held them in action with light skirmishes from day break till noon, then the enemy withdrawing themselves, he brought forth his

Legions and made a charge upon them. Hanno, though he saw a necessity of fighting contrary to his expectation, stoutly entring into battel, maintained it doubtful till the day was almost spent. But the Romans, having on purpose well refreshed their bodies and prepared them to fight, were not so much troubled with heat, thirst and Labour as were the Carthaginians, who, before the battel, being weary with failting and flanding all day, the longer they fought, were the leffe able to relift by reason of the weaknefie of their Bodys. At length the Mercenary fouldiers who flood in the front were no longer able to endure the brunt, and did not only give back themselves, but falling in diforderly upon the Elephants and other Regiments behind, routed the whole battel and canted them to fly before the enemy who so hotly charged them. Things were managed with the same fuccesse in the other place, for Hannibal, issuing out to fight, was beaten back with the great- Zonaras er losse, and forced into the City again. ftraw (which he had beforehand prepared for this purpole) he was a good way on his journey before the Romans, at break of day perceiving what was in hand, surprised part of the hindmost Troops; Hannibal with the rest betook himself into places of security. The Agrigen. tines feeing themselves for faken by the Carthaginians, either out of anger, or to curry favour with the Conqueror, flew many of those who remained in the City. The Town was not therefore faved from destruction, above five and twenty thousand Free-men were fold into In this manner was Agrigentum taken, in the seventh moneth after it had been first besieged to the great profit and glory of the Romans, but with the expence of much blood, for of the Conful's Army and his Auxiliaries, there perished by several means above thirty thousand during this fiege; for which cause, and by reason winter now approaching nothing of moment could be undertaken, they returned to Meffana. These Commanders going to Rome in hope of Triumph the next year L. Valerius, M.F. M.N. Flaceus, and T. Osacilius, C.F. M.N. Craffur being made Confuls went into Sicily. The Carthaginians having fet forth a great Navy as to the plunder and wasting of Italy, thought thereby to divert the Confuls from the care of Sicily, but they having sufficient guard upon the coasts to repel the invaders, did neverthelesse cross over into Sicily, where they received many towns which yielded themselves to their protection, being terrified by the late example of the Agrigentine overthrow. The Carthaginians in the mean time made no reliftance, for belides their late ill fucceffe they were vexed with the fedition of their Mercenaries, the Gauls being chief in the Mutiny for want of many moneths pay; for the punishment of whom, Hanno devised this stratagem, first soothing them with fair speeches he desires them, At present for a while to be quiet, telling them, He was in certain hopes of suddenly surprising a very rich Town, by the plunder whereof the Gauls should be sufficiently satisfied, both for their pay, as also for the for bearance of it. Having by this means at prefent apseafed them, and moreover received thanks, he takes a convenient time to treat with his Treafurer, (who was most faithful to him) That be would, as a Runegado, flie over to Otacilius the Conful, under presence of having perverted his Accounts, and inform him, That next night he might circumvent four thousand Gauls, who would come to Entellia to take it with the belo of some Traitors within.

The Conful though he gave not much Credit to a Runegado, yet thinking it a bufineffe not to be neglected, did fend a Choice Brigade of fouldiers upon the delign; the Gaules came accordingly as they had been deceived by Hanno, and the Romans fuddenly arising out of ambush to receive them, there was between them a very fierce and cruel fight, wherein every one of the Gaules were flain, and because they died not unrevenged, Hanne was doubly pleased, both that he was rid of his infolent Mutineers, and that he had cunningly punished them to the no little loss of the enemy. At Rome, in the mean time, Minucius the Prætor propounded in the Senate, the Frontinus de bringing of the water of the River Anien to the Citie, which work M. Curius the Genfour Aqua ductibus had deligned out of the enemies spoiles, but several impediments arising, the business for nine years deferred, was now again confulted about: and two men appointed as supervisours, Curius and Fulvius Flaccus; but Curius dying within five dayes, the Glory of finishing the work was attributed to Fulvius alone. About the same time Hamilear came from Carthage into Sicilie as successour to Hanno. For the Carthaginians, when Hanno returned after his overthrow, received him with Ignominy, fined him in his fix thousand pieces of Gold and removed him from his Government. Some Authors being deceived by the likeness of Names. have delivered, that this Amilear was Father of Hannibal who managed the second Punick War against the Romans; but not rightly, for Hamilear the Father of Hannibal came into Sicilie with command, being but a young man, at the latter end of this War, but his great fame prevailed, that the acts of another leffe known Amilear were ascribed to Amilear Barcas the most Noble and Egregious of that Name. Hamilear therefore the successour of Hanno seeing the Romans far stronger then himself in their land army, durst not assault any In-Land Cities, nor descend out of the Mountaines and difficult places into the Campagne: but having a strong Navy whereby he was doubtless Master of the seas, made diligent use of those his Forces, and, having fent Hannibal againe to plunder the Coafts of Italy, himselffailing about the Sicilian shore, easily recovered many Port Townes which had joyned themselves with the Romans. Whereby it came to passe, that the Romans easily taking and defending the Inland places, the Carthaginians the Maritime, the Feare and hopes were on both fides very equal, and it was hard to Judge to which of these two Nations the Victory of the whole War would engline.

OUR years were now expired fince the Carthaginian war began, neither had the Romans any cause to complain either of their own courage or fortune; for they were Victors in every battel, both over Carthaginians and Syracufans as often as they durft encounter: They had taken many rich Cities by ftorm, and others upon Articles submitted themfelves, but as long as they waged war in an Island, they could not at their pleasure fend provision and recruits when need required. And the Carthaginian ships with free and unexpected arrival being themselves se-

likewise wasted the coasts of Italy, both to the losse of the Roman Empire, and likewise to Polybian. their difgrace; whereas the Affrican shore was clear and free from the enemies invasion. The Senate therefore and people of Rome diligently confulting upon the matter, did reforte to pre-pare a Fleet, and fight the Carthaginians not only by land, as hitherto they had done, but to try their fortune at lea allo. This was the very first ferious thought the Romann had concerning fea affairs, which they accomplished with as much Courage and good Fortune, as they had coneeived it with Wildom and Resolution: Insomuch as the Empire of the whole world might well be judged due to the Romans, who being willing by fea to encounter a people most skilful in fea affairs, wanted neither Boldneffe to attempt it, nor Diligence to manage it, nor Constancy effectually to perform it. For the Romans to that day being so utterly ignorant of sea affairs, that there was not a man amongst them who ever had seen one, neither had any one Man of War of their own, or any Carpenter who knew how to build one, yet having with great confidence undertaken the delign, they did in a very short time both learn to fail and venture to fight and overcame those people who for many ages had had experience in sea affairs.

vercame those become was committed to Cn. Cornelins L. F. (n. N. Scipio Afina, orefus. and C. Dniliss, who had newly entred the Confulfilip. They had one Carthaginian ship of five Oars, which Claudius took with his foot army (at what time he was studying to passe Aust. de viris over into Sicily) while in heat of fight it came too near the shore and was grounded upon the Illust. c. 37 fands in a shallow place. The Consuls ordered the whole Navy to be built after that Patterne, plinie 16.39 and fo diligently profecuted the work, that in threefcore days after the timber was felled, they Florm 2,2 had threescore ships standing at Anchor. But the Consuls hastned their expedition no less by their wit, then by their Industry, For, (being neither willing to hazard to fight with men unskil-ful at the oar, nor yet to streighten the time allotted them for action in training up and exercifing men on purpole) they contrived a device, which though it may at first shew seem ridicu-lous, yet in the use and event proved exceeding Commendable, That, while the ships were in building, their Men should sit on shore and there be taught their office how to Rowe. For being placed in the same order as they were to observe in the ships, and a Boatswaine being set in the midft of them, they were commanded, at his word given, to move their Oars, and again to forbear, even as if they were failing.

By this exercifing themselves in fancy onely they were so improved, that when the ships were ready, after a few daies real paines-taking, the Confuls were willing to trust themselves

Army fell to C. Duilius, the Fleet to Cn. Cornelius; who, taking along with him feventeen thips, failed before hand to Messana, to make preparation for the coming of the Fleet, which he ordered suddenly to follow him: but before it came, he fell into the hands of the Enemy, which came to passe by the cunning of Boodes, Hanniball's Vice-Admirall, and his own Credulity, giving credit to some Lipararans, who were suborned by the Enemy, to put him in hopes of things, he nevertheless resolved to encounter them, and seek his safety by fighting: but that Boader by another fraud, trained him and his Colonells into his own ship, under pretence of Treating on Conditions of Peace. They were no sooner come but clapt up in chaines, the others being hereby terrified did without blowes yield themselves up; Boodes gaining all the Vessels, sent the Prisoners to Carthage. Soon after the Carthaginian Commander committed the like fault to his greater shame, in that the fresh example of the Consul's incogitancy did not learn him to be more circumspect. He had understood that the Roman Navy failing by the Italian shore, was putting forth to sea, and that they could not now be farre off. Defiring therefore, as neer as might be, to observe it, that he might occurately know the number of their ships, their swiftness, and in what fashion and plight their new made Vessels were in, he failed forward with fifty ships, not foreleeing any danger, his ships being confusedly mixed without any order, as when they ride in Harbour or any fafe place: At the turning therefore of a certain Promontory, fuddenly falling into the Roman Fleet, which came prepared and failing in good order; he was vanquished before he could prepare himself to fight, and having lolt the greater part of his Navy, himfelf likewise being in great Danger, he very hardly escabed with the reft. The Victorious Navy, understanding Cornelius his mishap, sent Messengers to C. Duilius to give him notice of their approach, and prepared themselves for fight, having intelligence that the other Carthaginian ships were not farre off.

There while they deligently considered the inconvenience of their own Vessells, that they were rudely made, and farre inferiour to the Carthaginians in swiftness, it came into the mind of a certain ingenuous man to invent an Engine, whereby to lay hold and keep fast the Enemies, ships; which Engine they afterward called a Raven, or Crow; the fashion of it was this, There was a straight round piece of Timber, four ulnes long, fome nine inches Diameter, having at the end thereof a pully or windlase, to which, being fixed on the foredeck, there was fitted a bridge, six ulnes broad, and four feet long, made of plankes fastned together with iron nails. In this Engine there was left a long hole whereby it might be fitted to the piece of Timber, by the space of four ulnes, even the whole length of the Timber. The other part of the bridge or ladder, which was not inferted in the Timber, being of two ulnes long, was so fastned by hinges, that it might be pulled up, or let fall; to the end of the bridge was affixed a fitrong sharp piece of iron, with a ring at it's head, whereto a rope being tied, through the pully of the timber, it might be drawn down into the Foredecke; Then as they listed, by the Rope they could draw it up, or let it fall down, with its sharp piece of iron laying hold on and keeping fast whatfor-ver it fell-upon. In the mean time the Confull C. Doiling, committing his foot Army to the Charge of his Colonells, came to the Navy, and understanding that the Enemies spoiled the Region of Mylaises, failed with his whole fleet to that shore.

Hamiball the Admirall, who had conveiged his Forces on of Agrigantum, was a Velfell of feven oares on a fide, which formerly belonged to King Pyrrhui, the other thips followed him: not as to a fight, in any diffinct order, but, as every one thought fit, making haft to their despicable Enemy. But, when approaching neerer, they faw the Engines hanging at the foredecks of the Roman ships, wondring at the novelty of the busines, they paused a while; at length the most Couragious men laughing at the rude invention of an unskillful Enemy, the foremost ships with all the violence that might be flew upon them. Then the Crows being let down, into what thips foever they light, so pierced the planks thereof that they held them fast against their wills; The Roman fouldiers, if the ships were fastned side to side, did on every part leapin and assault the Enemy; if they were joyned onely in the foredecks, they went two by two over the bridge annexed to the timber, with fo much the more facility, because on each fide of the bridge a little fence knee high, made their passage safer, and their footing more secure: They who went foremost, holding their bucklers before, defended their saces from the Enemies datts, those who followed held their shields down to the little fence, so guarding their sides, and entring the Enemies thips; fo that the fight was not performed with the Beakes of thips, but with fwords and hands, like to a fet Battell; The Romans therefore excelling in strength and Courage, had an eafy victory over men lightly armed, and trufting more in the nimbleness of their flups, then in their hands; They quickly forced thirty Carthaginian ships, among which the Admiralls frigot was taken, but Hanniball leaping out of his ship, when it was now taken, into a Cock-boat escaped Captivity, and sending a trusty friend in post-haste to Carthage, to prevent the News of his Overthrow, did thereby cunningly decline that Capitall punishment which otherwise had attended him. Duiling called an Assembly, wherein L. Corneting, L. Fo. C. N. Scipie and C. Agniling M. F. C. N. were chosen Consulin. The Senate ordered their Provinces to be Sicily, and the Navy. The Admirall had permission, if he thought it for the Publick good, to touch upon Sardinia and Corfica. This Charge happening to L. Cornelius, having prepared his ships he failed away.

This was the first Roman expedition into Sardinia and Corfica; the Islands are so near adjoyning that they feem but one and the fame, yet much unlike, as in the temper of the Air and Soil, so in the Dispositions of the inhabitants. The Island is plentiful in Honey, but it is of a bitter tast, much like the slower of Box, which tree in great number groweth there; yet it is very wholfome, and many think your Corficans to be therefore long-lived, because they ordinarily use that Honey. Their Towns are not very great nor very populous, yet there is above thirty of them, the principal whereof are Aleria a Colony of the Phoceans, and Nicea of the Etturians. The Air is here very troublesome, and therefore the seas rough. The Carthaginians therefore had long wars with these nations, and Seneca Conf. ad obtained the dominion of both Islands, except places inacceffible. But because wild and rude men were easier to be vanquished then tamed, they bethought themselves of many means whereby to keep them under, they likewife corrupted all the fruits of the Island, and under pain of death prohibited the Natives to fow or plant any fuch thing, that they might be forced to fetch all necessaries from Africa, till at length grown somewhat more gentle they learned with patience to bear the yoke.

To these Islands at this time did Cn. Cornelius stear his course, and first in Corsica stormed the City Aleria, after which without much labour or danger he took the reft. From thence as he failed towards Sardinia, he met the enemies Fleet, which he presently put to flight before they came to grapple. After this he went to Olbia, where feeing many Carthaginian ships in the Haven, and thinking himself not strong enough in foot to storm a City so well scituate, and defended by a great multitude, for the present he omitted the business, and failed home for a

About the same time a servile Commotion, in the Citie, which was in the beginning happily suppressed, did both afflict the Commonwealth with great fear, and likewise secure it. Many out of the new conquered Nations, were preffed for fea fervice, whereof there were then four thousand in Rome, most of them Samnites; these men abhorring the sea, did secretly bemoane their own Condition and fo far exasperated one another that they were resolved to burn the Citie and plunder it: They had already drawn in above three thousand accomplices into the conspiracy, which daily gathered more strength, when Erius Potelius, Commander of the Auxiliaries, did by his wisdom prevent all danger. For he seigning himself engaged in the same saction, was made privie to all their Contrivances; he was acquainted with the number of them, nay with the nation, and name of every particular person in the conspiracy; he knew the pace and the time where and when they intended to act any thing. He now wanted nothing to the accomplishment of his own private design, but onely to discover theirs to the Senate, but thither he could not find no opportunitie of going, because the Samnites would never suffer him to walk alone; at length having devised this trick, he perswadeth them. That when the Senate next met, they foould come by bands into the market-place, and complain that they were cheated in the Measure of their Corn, that then they should have occasion offered of executing their Purpose, er at least under stand of what mind and opinion the Fathers will be in upon such sudden motions and ftirs. And to gaine the more Credit in the business, he went along with them, manifesting himself not ony a Companion in the Tumult, but the Author and Ringleader of it. Whereupon being called into the Senate he discovered to them the danger of the secret Plot and cause of his own diffimulation. The Fathers, taking no notice of what they knew, fent Messengers with good words to pacifie the Rout, and command them home, affuring them with all, That the Senate would take order for Redresse of their Grievance, and that every one should enjoy his Right. The Conspiratours, thinking their Designes was still kept close, went their way: The night following every Mafter bound his fervants, whom according to Positius his Information, he knew guilty of the treason, the Samnites also were most of them seized upon in their Quarters. Either the care of this or some other business, or sicknesse was an hindrance to C. Florus, that he did not goe into Sicily fo foon as ordinary, whereby Hamiltar after his last Victorie had time much to encrease the Carthaginian Power there. For having taken Camarina and Enna by Treachery, he fortified Drepans, where was a very fair Haven, and enlarged it in forme of a Town, bringing the Erycines thither to Dwell, whole Citie, left it fhould be fervicable to the Romans he totally demolished, excepting the Temple of Yens. After this he reduced many other places under his power either by deceit or by force, and was in a likelyhood of conquering all Sicilie, but that Florus, for this reason not daring in winter to forlake the Iland, tarried to oppose him. The other Consul had an Easier Taske with the Sardinians and Carthaginians at Olbia; whether being returned with encrease of strength, he found Hanno there, who after the removal of Hannibal was made Admiral. Thence Asilius marched to Mysistratus, which being stoutly defended, at length the Garrison souldiers, being wearied with the cries and Lamentations of women and Children, forfook it. The Carthaginians went out in the night time; at break of day the Townsmen opened the Gates. But the Romans bearing too much in mind the Incommodities they had endured in the flege thereof, flew every one they met without destinction of age or fex , till A. Atilius the Conful caused proclamation to be made . That both Plunder and Prisoners should belong to those who took them. Then at length Covetouinels overcame Cruelty, and the rest of the Citizens were saved and made Captive: The Citie was plundered and demolished. The Army being thence led towards Camarina, fell into very great Diodona danger, for want of knowledg in the Country. For the Carthaginian General meeting them Zonaras had first possessed the higher places, and as it were belieged the Romans rashly entred into a had first posterior the nighter praces, and as it were beinged the romain trainly content and disadvantagous vallie, every one thought they saw before their Eyes the very picture of the Agellian 3.7.

For he following the Example Livie Epis, 17. of P. And so it came to passe, for while the enemy converted themselves wholly upon these men, they being resolved to die, did so long maintain a sharp fight with the greater number, that the Conful had time to explicate himfelf out of that unhappy place. The Carthaginians having flain those who did indeed on purpose offer up themselves (putting no hope in their ambush which was now discovered) departed. The fortune of Calpurnius was next to a Miracle, for he being found among the heaps of his own and the enemie dead bodies, was the only man had breath left in him , and being carryed orofins 4, 8 away and diligently fomented (among many wounds having not one mortal) he recovered, and afterward did great and faithful fervice to the Commonwealth; and proved of great terror to the enemy. If he had among the Grecians performed such a deed of Valor, they would not Illus, 6,39, have known how to have best owed rewards, or have decreed Monuments enough to his Honor : M. But the Conful being freed from those straits Ageilius; he was in, made his error an argument of shame, and his danger of watchfulness and circumspection. Therefore with the greater courage and care he proceeds to the assault of the City. and being not able to prevail against it without Engines of battery, he borrowed some of Hiere, With them he brake down the walls, and reduced Camarina into his power, the Citizens for Diedorus the most part he fold for slaves. Whereupon the Garrifon of E-beffus being difficantened, forfook the Town. So E-beffus came again into the Romans hands. The Confull Encouraged with this fucces, and thinking that many of the Lipargans favoured him, advanced with his Army to their City: Bur there he had not the like Fortune. For Hamilcar having intelligence of the Romans Defign, privately entered Lipara, and diligently expected the time of Action. The Romans being ignorant of this, boldly and unawarily coming up to the walls, were by a fudden fally of the Carthaginians beaten back. Many were wounded in that Conflict, and no small number slain. In the mean time C. Sulpicius the Conful had many encounters with the Enemy in Sardinia, and all prosperous. And his mind was so erected, that he made bold to fail toward perswade Hanniball, that the Remans were again sailing to Africa. He being deluded by this Crast, suddenly setting saile, before he was aware, met with the Consull who in a convenient place waited for him: Many Carthaginian ships were sunk, before they knew what they were about, the Conful's stratagem being much favour'd by a Mist opportunely arifing: At length understanding what was the matter, the other ships went some back into the Haven, others drove themselves on shore, where the men landing themselves, most of the Vessels were taken empty: Hanniball despairing to recover the Port, betook limstess of Sulsi, where, in a sedition, being apprehended by the Carthaginians, who had fled out of the same fight, he was by them Crucified, saying, that his Felty and Rashnels was the cause Livie Epis, 17. of their Overthrow. But this Victory of the Romans was an occasion of some loss to them afterwards. For being freed from fear of the Carthaginian Navy, while they boldly and fecurely wasted the Grounds, they were suddenly routed by an unexpected incursion of Sardinians and Carthaginians, one Hanne being Commander. C. Duilius was this year Censour, and built the Temple of James in the Herb-Market. After this two Triumphs were made, the one of C. Aquilius Florus Pro conful over the Carthaginians, the fourth of the Nones of October, the other of C. Sulpicius the Confull over the Carthaginians and Sardinians, the third of the Nones. When C. Atilias M. F. M. N. Regulas, and Ca. Cornelius, L. F. Cn. N. Blafio again were Confulls, the Senate ordered Sacrifices to be made for avoiding the Omen of some Prodigies. In the Albane Mount, and other places, and in the City it selfe many ftones fell as Haile; 'Twas thought fit to Solemnize the Latine Festivall, and in order to that, a Dictatout was created, Q. Ogulnius, L.F. A. N. Gallus. The Master of Horse was M. Latorins. M. F. M. N. Plancianus, C. Avilius, the Admiral liaving failed to Tyndarides in Sicily, when he espied the Carthaginian Navy passing by, out of order, suddenly resolved to fet upon it; And commanding the other thips to follow, halfify fets forward with ten, which were Ready, and with all freed both of fall and Oare endeavours to overtake the Carthaginians, still before him. Hamslear, a very considerable Commander, was in that Fleet who feeing but few thips neer him, others scarce yet out of the Haven, the greater part fill at Anchor, fleering back, circumvented Atilias and his faips with his whole Navy, nine of them he funk presently, not able to maintain fight with so great a Number. The Admirals Frigat being better manned, and the Mariners encouraged by the presence of the Consull, brake out from amongst them by main strength and saved it selfe. For the other Roman Vessells were now come up, by whose help the Fortune of the Battell was changed. Eight of the Carthaginian thips were flink , ten with all their men taken ; the relt fleered to the Liparans llands. Thefe things were done at Sea. The Land Forces were not fo quick at their Work having in vain affaulted the City Lipara: But with all hostility they spoiled the open Fields; the same Calamity also attended the Hand Melites, not farre diffant. For these Exploits C. Atilins the Confull made a Navall Triumph over the Carthaginians. The fame year A. Atili-Laptor de virle us the Pro-Confull Triumphed over the Carthaginians of Sieily the fourteenth of the Calends of February. The Romans were then in a very joyfull state and Condition, being Victours not Colum. Copitol. onely at Larid, but at fea alfo; And did now begin to Confult not onely of the Conquett of Sicily and the Neighbouring Ilands, which they thought fure enough their own; but of invading Africa alfo, and bring the Terrour of the War to the Gates of Carthage it felfe.

Fterwards L. Manlins, A. F. P. N. commonly called Longus, did enter dation of the upon the Confulship, and L. Cadicius, Q. F. Q. N. after whose City. death, M. Atilius, M. F. L. N. Regulus, who had been fometimes Conful, succeeded in his Office. Then onely in this year Africa, Capitalina Tawhich hitherto had been free from any miseries by an Enemy, began to besensible of a war, when the Romans had made an invasion thereinto, after they had in a great Sea fight gained the Victory over the Carthaginians fleet; which exploits, as they were atchieved, we shall in this Book fet forth, and both the one and the other fortune of that same Regulns, and his end not fuitable to the gallantry of the man; The year before when the Carthaginians, C. Atilins being Confull, did to strive to get the best in a Sea-conflict, that when they had lost many ships, they first gave over fighting, yet because they had sunk some certain of the Roman Veilels, they would not take themselves to have been of lesser reputation; On the other part, the Romans did judge that event as an undoubted Victory. So it was that the vast multitude on both fides did bend their mindes with greatest emulation to the study of Sea-Affaires. And Polyb. 1.15 therefore the Confulls being charged to remove the warre into Africa, when they were come to Orifus 4. Me Jana, with an Armado of three hundred and thirty ships, and from thence passing by the Polyb. Coast of Sicily on the right hand beyond Pachinus, to take in the Foot Forces, they having alfo some Forts near the Hill Esnomus, they failed forward. And about the same time Hamilcar General of the Carthaginians, and Hanno the Admirall, being Commanders of a Fleet of three hundred and fixty thips, having paffed by Lilybaum in Carthage, and then Heraclea Minoas, in that bay they confult of casting Anchor, observing the motions of the Romans. and if they durft bend towards Africa, they were in a posture to stop their course; which when the Con/ulls were informed of, they with good advice make all things ready for either chance; that they might not be to feek for Counfell, whether they were to engage in a Sea-conflict, or to draw some whither for safety: therefore committing the ships to some of the stoutest Souldiers, they make four Squadrons, as fo many parts of the whole fleet; the choicest men they fet in the first Squadron, the two next Squadrons they place in their order, in the Reare-guard they put their chiefest men for strength, the Triarii, these forces they dispose of in such array, that each ship did carry 300 rowers, and six score Souldiers. So the Muster Roll in the whole Navy did amount to an hundred and forty thousand men.

The Carthaginians did fomewhat exceed that number, leading more fouldiers then an hundred and fifty thousand. And indeed the Consults did scarce esteem of any other fort of souldiers in comparison of their own. There was so much the more consulting, when it did appear, they must needs fight in the deep Ocean; where the swiftness of the ships, and the skill of the Pilots are of much advantage, to the fit ordering the front of the battell aray against that danger; finally they consider of placing the whole Fleet aright. They set two Gallies wherein the Confulls themselves were carried, very even in the Van, to both those Gallies they joyn on this fide the first Squadron, on that fide the second in a long continued row; the ships being placed in such manner, that the fore castles of them all were turned outwards, and the Gallies did move almost joyned together, the ships next to those did keep from each other more apart, and so consequently the space left between the opposite ships did grow wider according to their being fet in order. So when the form of the Van in manner of a wedg was shaped, with small distance between the first ships, and with great spaces between the last. then did they cause the third Squadron to advance, which bearing that open spacebetween the two first ships, did meerly by their order, exhibit a triangular form of the whole array; behind this, at the third Squadrons back, the long boats were drawn by a Barge with Cables to pull with, reaching to the ships of the Tertian fouldiers. The Triaris the fouldiers fet in the Rear-ward, did so inviron the former, the ships being stretched out into a halfe circle, that from each Wing they did appear; So the whole body with a deep hollow front, the hindmost parts being firmely folid, did refemble the fnout of a ship, not less able to receive a violent af-fault, then fit to give one.

But the Carthaginian Captains having intelligence by their Scouts of the approach of the Roman fleet, when they confidered, the passage to their City was not difficult, the common fort were nothing manly, the bordering Neighbours inconstant, and very prone to fall from their fidelity, they conclude to go out to meet them : being refolved first to try all that might be, rather then they would suffer, that the Roman Vessels should have a safe Voyage into Africa. Therefore they betake them to their ships, incouraging their men in short, That they would undertake the fight with mindes sirmely bent and chearfull, well remembring they were to sight, not only touching things present, but in reference to all things, which each one held precions at home; and with their own good hope, and that of their fellow Seamen, they lanch forth out of the Harbour; nor was the Romans fleet far diffant, therefore not far from Heraclea they give the shock against each other with equals stoutness, The Carthaginian Captains did so provide, that Hanno should charge on the Right Wing, (but it was he that had been unfortunate at Agrigentum) Hamilcar should be Commander over the rest. And they also divide their ships into four Squadrons, having observed the array which the Romans had made use of; Of these, that which was the left Wing of the whole array being crooked like a bow, did make towards the shore, the rest were extended in their plain order, and turned upon the first Squadron of the Enemies ships. Hereupon the Right Wing in which there were very fwift Vessells with snouts and five oares in a seat, Hanno did stretch it out all he could towards the main Ocean, being ready to furround the Enemy, if the skirmish should begin at any other part. And the Confulls not staying long did venture themselves with their two Squadrans into the midt of the Carthaginian thips, Hamilear that he might break the array of the Romans did charge his fouldiers, when the Conflict began, they should presently take their slight, which being done, and the Romans eagerly pursuing them, the Carthaginians indeed had no hurt by their flying, in regard their ships were swift: but the array of the Romans, as Hamilcar wished. and had foreseen, was rent asunder, when yet the Triarii, and the third Squadron did keep their places, which, when he faw it performed, he suddenly gives a sign out of his own ship, that their fore-castles being turn d, they should encounter those that did pursue them: the sight was doubtfull, the Carthaginians excelling in swiftness, and in skill for Navigation. The Romans being farre transcendant in the stoutness of their souldiers; Therefore so long as the fight rather of the ships, then of the men, did last, the Carthaginians had the better clearly: But when they began to fight hand to hand, the ships being fastned close with grapling irons, then the Victory did certainly incline towards the Roman party: When the fouldier full of confidence through his hand-strokes, and fighting before the Confulls, did strive to approve his valour to them with a more notable endeavour: while the skirmish was so managed in that part, Hanno with the Right Wing, which hitherto he kept unmov'd, made a fierce affault, being carried by the tide amongst the ships of the Triarii, and did create them much troublesom work, when they were brought to great diffress; At the same time almost, the Lest Wing also of the Carthaginians, the first posture being changed, and with a front made even, does affail with dangerous beaks the third Squadron of the Romans, which drew their long boats by a Barge. The Romans having flipt their Cables, did prepare themselves for refistance; Here alfo they shew much Gallantry: So in three places, there do happen even just so many Sea-fights, far diffant from each other.

When they had fought so hard, the Victory long enough inclining to either side, at last it chanced, as needs it must, where there is fierce bickeering in fundry places at once, with equall force and vehemency, that the felfe same part which is first routed should cause the whole Victory. For when Hamilear was utterly unable any longer to withftand the Violence of his Enemies, his fingle flight did immediately disperse even the whole fleet of the Carthaginian. For L. Manlins one of the Confulls, being very much busied about bringing together the ships that were taken, and chaining them to his own, M. Regulus espying the fight to begin asresh in another place, he made halte to relieve his own fide, taking to him the thips of the fecond Squadron, all that escaped out of the former fight safe and unshattered; The Triaris did soon perceive that reliefe, and recollecting their Spirits, which had even failed them in extremity of Danger, they began to oppose their Enemies with great undauntedness. Hanno, when he saw that both those before him made frout refistance, and that himselfe was so over-charged on the Reare with fresh supplies, hoising up fail he did his best to avoid his approaching overthrow. And when L. Manlius amidit these tryalls beheld the third Squadron of the Romans to be enforced towards land by the Carthaginians Left Wing, he steered that way, and M. Regulus overtook him unawares, who had even now fet the long boats and the Triarii out of harmes reach. So the state of things is foon quite changed, and they are furrounded very close, who but just before had hemmed the Romans in. Whom indeed being strangely encompassed, and in a manner straightly besieged, they might e're this have utterly destroyed, unless not daring to go near them for fear of the iron raven-beaks they were wont to grapple with, they gave the Confuls time enough that themselves being safe they might even secure their own side, and the Carthaginians, that were environ'd by a sudden surprizeall, had leisure to take, as with a net, fifty ships, and all that were therein, so the other few stealing away by the very shore side did make their es-

This Sea-conflict as well in regard of various ill accidents, and the eagerness of the encounter, as also for the number of thips lost on both sides, was of fair remark. Of the Carthaginian ships sixty and three were taken, above thirty were sunk. The Conquering Romans Orosius 4:8 loft four and twenty by reason of soul weather, but not one of them did fall into the hands of

When this victory was over, returning to Messana they allotted certaine daies to mend their ships, and refresh their men, and to take in store of new provision. Amongst which, Zonavas Hamilear when he would not yelld by any means, the Romans should go to Africa, but Poblim wanted frength to ftop their march, he betook himself to frratagems, and sought, by fending 200naras Hanno to them to fue for peace, to prolong the time, till the arrivall of the forces which he lookt the Carthaginians would fend him. Hanno when he made his addresse to the Confuls, and heard the exclamations of the people, that the same decree ought to pass against him, which five years before the Carthaginians had delign'd against Cornelius Asina then Conful, he thifted off the threatned mischief with a subtill answer, Verity if ye Ball as so said the threatned mischief with a subtill answer, Verity if ye Ball not be bester at all then the very Africans; and presently the Consuls well resented what he said, commanding those to be filent that had voted him to chains, and there was a voice heard well befeeming the gravity of the Roman stock , O Hanno, the faithful dealing of our City does quit Val. Max. 6.6 thee from that Jear. It was in vain to move for peace because the Carthaginian did not deal fincerely, and the Confuls did rather aim at Victory then at Peace. Therefore they had no mind to defer any longer their intended voyage to Africa; Neither did the Carthaginian Commanders croffe the defign, though they engaged to each other, not to endure the enmy should march Zonaras without diffurbance, but to infeft him from fundry quarters, and to bar his passage. But Hanno making halt to fortify Carthage beforehand, Hamilear not daring to attempt ought tarries at Zonge Heracles. The Romans ships made a safe voyage free both from enemies and from tempelts. And there wanted not some that did strangely abominate any travelling far by sea, and the enemies coast, and the very name of Africa. Mannius, an Officer among the fouldiers, did first begin Florus. 2.2 to fpeak ill of government, but Regulus was so incented against him, that he threatned him that feourges and the axe should be his lot, unless he would submit. So at length the Consul was obeyed, and the nearer and the greater fear did expel the dread of travelling by fea. The Promontory is called Hermann which from the bosome of Carthage does firetch very far into the Sici-Polybing lian sea. That coast was first found out by the Roman ships, then after a little stay while the whole fleet came up together, the Confuls having passed by the coast of Africa, they arrived at the Citie Clupea. Here the fouldiers are exposed to hazard, and when the ships were put into harbor, there was a Trench drawn round for the more fecurity. The Citie becauseit refused to surrender, was belieg'd, and presently through the timerousnesse of the Citizens it being either yielded or deferted (for 'tis reported either way) it was reduced to the obedience

But the Carthaginians though they did endure things truly harsh, and very strange, yet they Zontron rejoyced at their weal, that they fared somewhat better then they expected: for when they pol heard what iffue the Sea-fight had, they were foreafraid, least presently the conquering forces would have been drawn even against Carthage it self. Therefore re-assuming some courage after their former fright, they were fully bent to make what strength they could to defend their City and the Suburbs thereof. Mean while the Confuls having fent messengers to Rome which would acquaint the Senators what exploits had been atchieved already, and should beseech their advice touching new attempts, they make Clupea a Garrison, that they might make use of Zonara that feat of war. And having fet a guard to defend the City and field adjoyning, they march. Poblish ing a great way forward with all their other forces, they utterly waste a very fruitful Country, which from the dayes of Agathoeles had not feerthe fword of an enemy; they destroy many goodly Villages, they force away whole droves of cattel, moreover they lead away by force above twenty thousand men, no man daring to gainfay; they also take many Towns by storm Zonarus or by furrender, wherein they apprehend feveral Revolters, and fet free many Roman Captives, that were taken in the late wars amongst whom I believe even Cn. Cornelius to have been, that was cholen Consul again after two years were expired. While things are thus acted, they that were fent to Rome by the Confuls, return with Orders from the Senate. One of them was com. Poblish manded to quarter in Africa, with such considerable forces as they held needful to be kept there. The other was required to bring back the rest of the seet, and the residue of the army

lus were made Confulls. The Government of Sicily and the Command of the Fleet are committed to the charge of those two: They were not minded to call back Regulus from amidst his Victories, while he went on prosperously in Africa; and he was ordered by the Proconsul to manage the War there That decree of the Senate no one did worfe refent, than he himfelfe, for whose honour 18 it was made. Therefore in his Letters to the Senate he made that his grievance, and fet it as the main ground of his fuit, that another might fucceed him in his Office, upon the death of his Bailiffe (he undertook to manure a piece of ground of feven Acres, which his Master had in Papi-Fal.Max., 4.6. nia) having gained an opportunity, he thence delivered up his Commission, and left his charge wherefore he must needs depart, least in his absence, when his ground lay untilled, his wife and Serves at Het- children should want bread. And the Senate did ordain, that M. Regulus his ground should be dreffed at the Publick charge, that what damage he had fultained should be made good, and fair provision should be made for his wife and children. Such good orders were then in use! But when I read of or relate these things and the like, I cannot chuse but recollect with my felf, which is the more lafting recompence for virtue, a reward by Coin, or by commendation, by pounds, or by praise. M. Regulus his renowne does endure many ages after his death, the wealth of others hath perisht with their Masters, and oftentimes before them: In the mean feason the Carthaginians having chosen two Generalls at home, Astrobal, Hanno's sonne, and Boftar; they fent also for Hamiltar their third Commander in chief to come out of Sicily. Who with five thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse came in all haste from Heraclea to Carthage. These having called a Councell do decree, that the Army should not be kept within Walls, as the manner heretofore had been, neither should the Roman souldiers be permitted to do what they lifted without any punishment. So when they were encouraged to wage War, the

In the mean time M. Regulus did march to all places near adjoyning through which the River

Bagrada does slide, subduing all before him, not far from which the Romans that held certain Caltles, were imitten with a fudden peftilence, and loft many, and were fore amazed. A water-Serpent of huge bigness did set upon the souldiers, and they being much afrighted and resisting all in vain, the Serpent did swallow down many of them with his wide yawning jawes, others he bruif'd to pieces with his furious windings, and with the strokes of his tail, some again he poyloned to death with the blafting of his peltiferous breath, and he made fo much ado for M.Regulus, that with all his forces he must fight with the Serpent for the possession of the River, which when it was done with the loss of many fouldiers, and the Dragon could neither be overcom, nor wounded, he with his extream hard cruft of Scales eafily repelling, what ever darts they did throw at him, they must make use of Engines, and without great Guns and Mortar-pieces, like a well fenced Tower, the Enemy is not to be overthrown; After severall hurlings that were made in vain, a great stone being cast, did break his back-bone all to shivers, and did dissolve the vigorous violence of the formidable Monster. And the business was effected with so much difficulty, and with fo great terrour to Horse and Foot, that the souldiers did averre they had rather oppose Carthage it selfe, then such another Monster. And the Camp could stay there no longer, but must shun the infected waters, and all the Country round about, which was blasted with the contagious stink of his lying there. This was some shame to the pride of men, which are wont to think very fondly, that they can Conquer all things. Truely when M. Regulus was Generall, that had been Conquerour by Sea and Land, one fingle Serpent when he was alive, did hold the whole Roman Army in plea, and being killed he made the Army draw off. And therefore the Proconfull did hold it no immodesty to fend the spoils even of this very Enemy to Rome, and to acknowledg with a publick Monument the greatness of his own fear, and his rejoycing at the victory. For he took order the skin of the beaft should be taken off and carried to Rome, which is reported to have been an hundred and twenty foot long, and being hanged up in a certain Temple to have lasted even till the Wars at Numantia. When the Camp was remov'd from Bagrada, the Confull commanded the Army towards the City Adie, all Towns and Castles being won and demolisht that lay in their road.

But to Adis, which was hard to take, there was a certain way of laying fiege by the help of warlike engines. To the croffing of which, when the Carthaginian Captains did speedily make haste they fate down on a certain hill, but full of wood and full of other impediments that was very near the Roman Camp. M. Regulus having well confidered the nature of the place, and what manner of enemies he had to deale with, when he faw their foot were not comparable to his, but that they put much confidence in their Elephants and horsemen, but such forces being very formidable in open fields by the inequality of the places would not be come at, and would be made very useless, he wisely taking some advantage by the folly of his enemies, before they could perceive and correct their error, determines to fall upon them in their own Tents. Wherefore encouraging his fouldiers, and diligently observing what reason did suggest, he goes out of his Camp before the dawning of the day, and does cause his army to advance towards the hill directly opposite, where the Carthaginians had pitcht their Tents. First of all, the audacious confidence of the Romans did even amaze the Carthaginians, which being far leffe in number did set upon such a vast army even in their own trenches, from a low place, and of great disadvantage. Then they were in the greater confusion even in this respect, because the horsemen and Elephants, from which they did hope for most assistance, were not only of no advantage, but did extremely hinder and diffurb them, and the very time did augment their trembling. that the Romans did fet upon them unawares, and most of them, as yet, being fast asleep, therefore many of them are put to the sword even in their huts, the others stragling in their amazed flight, and not knowing where to hide themselves, were taken by parties set on purpose to

Nevertheless the Carthaginians Mercenary souldiers, the Spainards and the French, being infantly in a good posture, and fighting Couragiously on the other fide of their bulwark it was doubtful a great while which would get the upper hand. The forlorn hope even now being put to the run, the whole Roman army had been overthron, if the horse from another quarter that were commanded to wheele about had not in the very nick of time charged the enemie on the reare that were pursuing those which fled. Then they also which a little before had deserted their station might now be rallied up and encouraged to fight afresh. So the enemy being set upon on both fides, when he had for a long time with much gallantry made refiftance, he was constrained to cry quarter. When the Carthaginians saw what was done, immediately they fling themselves out of their Sconces, and fall to running with all the speed they could make, and indeed the Elephants and the horsemen when once they came into plaines they could retreat well enough and fafely too. The Conquerors having purfued the infantry fomewhat far, they turn back at length to throw down their fortifications. In this Battel there were seventeene thousand of the Carthaginians that were slain, five thousand are reported to be taken prisoners, Orofius. thousand or the Latingumans trace where the state of this battel did purchase the Romans much friendship Entreput and eighteen Elephants. The successful of this battel did purchase the Romans much friendship Entreput Constant not only from all the Countryes round about, but even from people that were most remote. And in few dayes about fourscore walled towns vowed fidelity to the Romans. Whereas upon the Orofine. newes that Tunis such a fenced City was taken by Regulus , did even astonish the Carthaginians that were greatly firaitned before, and which was built twelve miles from Carthage, least it Livie, 30.9 fuffer what ever they did there to be kept fectet from the enemy, then being a fair prospect both to the very City it felfe, and to the fea hard by.

And the terrible dread of their war with the Romans did not onely dance round the Carthaginians, but the Numidians also, out of an old grudge being stirred up by a fresh opportunity, took up arms, and by spoiling and fireing the Carthaginian towns, brought more terrour and mifery upon them, then the Romans did. And the Boores from all parts flying for refuge to the City, did cause not only a huge dread, but also a great dearth, when such a multitude of people did devour a world of provision, and the avarice of the owners did conceale the plenty as yet in store, who gaping greedily for gain by that Common Calamity were full of hope the price of victuals would raife daily according to the decrease of their most necessary food. Whereupon it followed, the Embaffy of Marons Regulus was hearken'd to with greater heed, who aiming at the honor of finishing the war, and fearing least some one that might succeed him with a new commission from Rome should prevent him, he moves the Carthaginians to Conditions for peace. To that purpole fome of the prime Senators are fent unto him , but when they Zonaras faw strange harsh conditions offer'd, and their businesse at a stand, they took their leave of M. Regulus, who was verily perswaded he had Victory by the hand, Sicily for footh, and all Sar- Dio. spud dinia were commanded to yeeld, to fend freely home what Romans they had taken, to ran Torfinum, fome their own men, to bear the whole charge of the war, and to pay belides a pension by the year. They had other impolitions, full as burthenlome as these, That they should be confederates with the Romans for offence and defence; that they should use but one great ship; But ths Romans they should affift with fifty gallyes well appointed as oft as they should be required. The Embaffadours being transported with wonder at fuch Articles , and that Regulus might Diedori Belog. grant his vanquisht suppliants more milde conditions, he made this answer, Men must either b. 23 Conquer or cronch to shofe that fubdue them. By the return of which words the Carthaginians were much incenfed, though they had often made fuite for peace, yet they are fully bent, ra- Polyb. 1.31 ther to endure the work that could happen than to embrace those Conditions, which they held no other than the bondage and servitude of their Citie.

In that state, of affairs certain ships which were sent to wast some souldiers into Greece, did return when they had gathered up no small body of Mercenary souldiers; Among these there was Polybius one Xanthippus, by race a Lacademonian, who did couple the noble exercise of warfare with the discipline of his Country, wherein he had been well trained up from his youth. He sufficiently understanding what feats had been done already, and having insight enough into the other fur. Flows. 2. In the Carthaginian forces, of the Elephants and Horsemen, he made bold to speak a Polybian niture of the Carthaginian forces, of the Elephants and Horsemen, he made bold to speak a Polybian proud word openly, that the Carthaginians were not subdued by the Romans, but by themselves, by the weakness of their Commanders, that knew not the duty of their places. such evident reasons of that his judgement, that scarce ought could be more manifest; he shows them that in all their expeditions, in making their Fort, in joyning Battell, it was their manner ftill to pick out places utterly unfit, if they would liften to his advice, he does affure them not onely of fafety, but also of Victory. When severall of the Chiefe Citizens do approve of his judgement, and the very Commanders also themselves, and with beseeming modelly preferring the welfare of their Country before his fingle opinion, they agree and ordain that the guidance of his Army houldbe committed to a foreigner; Xanthippus having undertook his charge. dayly drawing his fouldiers out of the City, he does accultome the field Forces to observe and change their ranks, and instantly to do what they are commanded, and the confidence of better fuccess does fill the fouldiers with admiration of him, the whole City being cherished even in desperation, is raised up to expect joyfull things to come. When the Commanders behold this Univerfall Cheerfulness, they also taking heart thereby, resolve to give the Enemy another charge, and encouraging their fouldiers as opportunity did require, they march out against the Romans, even with almost twelve thousand Foot, with four hundred horis, and well nigh as many Elephants; that thing alone did perplex the Romans, that they faw the Carthaginians make their inroads through the plain fields, having changed their first defign, avoiding all steep and craggy places: But being puffed up with pride through their conftant felicity, they fet at nought the fouldiers that were wont to vanquish, and Graculus their Leader. And Regulus was not corrupted with that fawning poylon of fortune waiting on him. When he well confidered that he had routed the Sea-Forces of the Carthaginians, and the foot Souldiers too, that he had taken almost Author de viris two hundred Townes, two hundred thousand men, and that Carthage being fore streightned. might be enforced to surrender, he denied them peace when they sued for it on reasonable termes, and wrote to Rome, That the very Gates of Carehage which he had begitt did tremble at him. So also moderation hath oftner deserted great Spirits in prosperity, then constancy in adverfity : But the Carthaginians having pitcht their tents in a plain field, M. Regulus whose chiefest frength was in his infantry and thither he could not be followed but over Mountainous and freep difficult places, thinking it all one to his Valour where he fought, he was not afraid to trust himself in the Camp, even to the greater vanting of his confidence, paffing over the river that was in the midst, and distant from the Enemy even two hundred thousand paces. Xanthippus perceiving the indifcretion of the Roman Leader, did avouch this would be the very time, wherein he would performe what he had promifed the Carthaginians; for he had got the Romans even tired with long Marching, where his heart could wish them; he nothing doubted the Victory would be certainly his own; the time also did seem most commodious for the fight, because the day now drawing towards the evening, the Africans knowing well all places thereabout, if they should be overcome, they might make their escape the better in the night, or if they should conquer, the night would not hinder the pursuit of the Victory. Therefore the Carthaginians confulting what was to be done, Xauthippus calling for the help of Gods and Men, that they might not lofe such a singular opportunity, he did earnessly personade his men to undertake the Bat-tell, so much the easier, because the southiers themselves crying our to Xambippus, they did of their own accord with unusuall cheershines desire to encounter with the Enemy, therefore the charge of the main affair is granted to the Spartan, he drawes out the Army, and does exercise them after this manner. A four square body of 8000 Carthaginians, which were the prime Chosen men of all their foot, was set for a reserve; before this body, a convenient space being lest between, the Elephants are fet in order, being drawn up as broad as that square body; on either Wing the Horse are placed, behind these on the Right Wing, stands the main body of hired souldiers. The Army being fet in such array, he commanded the skirmishers, that having thrown their darts, they should stand in open order for the advantage of their own side, and when their main body should joyn with the Enemy, they should violently break out again from the Wings, and should on a sudden suriously slanke the Romans, when they were charging the opposite referve. On the contrary part Regulus having well drawn up his Army, when he faw the Elephants in the Front of the Carthaginians, he foon takes advice, he brings his fouldiers lightly armed to the Van, he fets the well Compact foot Companies in the Referve, the Horse are drawn up in the Wings, the Army is firme in respect of depth, but much narrower then before; fo that the chiefe danger being feared from the Enemies Elephants and Horsemen, they did indeed take a right course against the Elephants, but being in an open and Champain Country, there was room fufficient for the Horse to surround, the whole Army being so close compacted. The Fight was began by the Elephants, which Xanthippus commanded to be led against the oppofite Regiments, and the Romans making a great shout, set forward to meet them. The Horse were likewise engaged in both Wings; but there the Romans being much inseriour in Number, and not able to relift the Enemies charge, fled away. But the Foot which were of the Left Wing, (whether it were to avoid the Elephants , or that thereby they thought the more easily to obtain the Victory) charged the Mercenaries, and putting them to flight, purfued them to their very Camp. The reft of the foot had an harder taske against the Elephants, by whose vast bodies their ranks were difordered, themselves trodden under foot, and whole Companies like a falling house, struck down to the ground, yet the very thickness of the Battell hindred them from breaking through; till at last they were distressed on all parts, for the Flanks and Rear were galled by the Horse, the foremost who made a shift to break through the Elephants, were slain by the Enemy standing yet Entire, and the light-armed men flying in upon them. There was no less execution done in the Flight, the Elephants and Namidian Horse pursuing them in an open plain place. Regulus with almost five hundred souldiers was taken alive by the Enemy; of the whole Army Florus : .: there escaped but about two thousand (who had charged and put to flight the Mercenaries) Polyb there eleaper une account and the who beyond all Hope, by their hait, gor fare into Clupes; of the Romans and their Affociates Ολυμα, were flain about thirty thousand. Of the Carthaginians there were not many wanting befide δ. α. μ.ρ. eight hundred of the Mercenaries, who had fought against the Lest Wing of the Enemy. When Europius the Army returned to Carthage after fo great a Victory, carrying the Roman Generall Prifo- Poblins ner, a multitude of Citizens came out to meet them, others standing in the streets, or in their houses, beheld the spectacle with wonderfull Pleasure, which they durft lately scarce hope for; their mindes being not capable to believe fo great an Happiness attending them; For being of late so neer despair, giving not onely their Country, but very City for lost, they durst scarce bilieve to great a Change, though they faw it with their eyes : But they took most speciall notice of the Generalls, every ones eye and thought being fettled on them, looking fometimes on Xanthippus, fometimes on Regulus, Extolling the greatness of their own Commander, by the Estimation they had of the other. He must of necessity be a gallant Man who hash overcome of float a General, to formate a Warriour, a proad Conquerour, an implacable Enemy, the Terrour and Plaque of Carthage, now of a sudden bereaved of a numerous Army, having soft bas antient Fame and Liberty regather. Their Admiration was encreased by the habit and Siliut. 6. Garbe of the Man, who under a small body, and none of the best lookes, carried a large and Polyb. virtuous mind. For this Exploit Xanthippus had much glory, and withall as much envy, to avoid which he used as much art as in finishing the Warre, for whereas he might justly expect an everlasting reward of his good service at Carbbage, yet he resolved to leave those doubtful hopes and full of Treachery, and return home, before other mens affections, or his own fortune were Orofius 4. 9. altered. For this is for the most part the disposition of men, that openly they profess the love of their Country, but really study their own private good; as long as their City being in fafety, they can obtain and quietly enjoy Honour and Riches, they pretend mighty love to their Country: But where there is danger left they should bestow the same benefits on others for their egregious merits, they had rather want a man who doeth good to the Common-wealth, then have him in the least way hinder their private commodity: As long as they think themselves able to equall others, their envy is hidden and more remifs, but when they see themselves farre exceeded, and that Honour duely given to others which they defired for themselves, then what they were not able by virtue to obtain, they feek it by Calumnies and Criminations. So that the best men have ordinarily most Enemies and are most subject to Treachery; But a Native of Polyb. the Country lath some remedy against this Evill in his Friends and kindred; A stranger being voide of all helpe and affishance encreases the Malice of degenerate mindes by his being easy to be hurt, in that he is more exposed to Treasons, and may without any great labour or danger be offended, affronted and undone. That Xanthippus apprehended and confidered these things. the sequel doth evidently demonstrate, 'Tis reported he was drowned by some sent after him from the Carthaginians, who after so great a benefit received, hated the Author of it, who being Zonaras once dead, they thought it would quickly be forgot that their Countrey was preserved by a For- Appian

Others deny Xanthippus thus to have perished, yet confess the Treachery of the Carthaginians, who at his Departure alletted him an old ship, full of Leakes, fairly pitcht over as if it had been found, but that he discovering the Cheat, Went aboard on another ship and escaped the danger. About the same time they committed another fact of no less Treachery, but much more cruell, by reason of the number that perished thereby. The Mercenarys in somewhat a tumultuous manner claiming a Reward of their paines taken, and happy Valour, were put into thips being made believe that in fome other place they should have their Defire : But the Captains of the thips who had such private Order, landed them and left them in a Barren Iland, where being deflitute of all helpe from man, without food, without thips, having famine on one fide, and the Sea on the other, they pined away and perished, a fowl and horrid kind of Death. Others referre this Fact to former times, when there was warre between the Syracusans and Carthaginians, and that the Iland was thereupon called Offodes, or the Bonie Iland, it lieth Dioder, 5,11. in the main Sea beyond Lipara Weftward. These deeds whensoever and howsoever performed. do nothing disagree with the Carthaginians usuall Cruelty. And if thus they served their Friends and Affociates, it is no wonder, they were more then ordinarily fevere against their Enemies. Other Prisoners indeed were somewhat tolerably well used, for they likewise had many Captives at Rome, for whom they intended to make an Exchange. But against M. Regulus they could neither cover nor moderate their Anger, but vexed and afflicted him all manner of wayes; they allowed him food which was neither pleafant to the Palate, nor strengthening to the Body but which with much adoe by a flitgh nourishment served to produce his Miserable life. But more grievous were the Contumelies and Reproaches daily heaped upon him, amongst the reft, they would frequently on a fudden introduce an Elephant, to fright him with the noise and ugly shape of it, not suffering him to rest neither in Mind or body, and being thus miferably handled, and brought low, they cast him into the common Gaole.

When

When these things were heard at Rome, the City was filled not only with great grief but with fear alfo; for they mistrusted least the Carthaginians, provoked with the sense of their own calamities, and encouraged by this victory, should recompence them in the like kind and dare to come even to the walls of Rome to inflict on them the same milchies themselves had suffered. The Senate therefore commanded the Confuls, To strengthen Italy as diligently as might be with Sufficient Garrisons, themselves with a wast Navy to fail into Sicily, and thence if they thought fi into Africa, to divert the Carthaginians from any expedition into Italy. But the Garthaginians in the first place made it their care to reduce those Cities which the Romans had possessed. to punish those Africans who had revolted from them, and by strength of arms to vanquish those who perished in rebellion. Cinpea was indeed by the Romans stoutly desended, but in Namidia, and over the other Africans (though their war was great) their victory was In the mean time, understanding that a great Fleet was preparing in Italy, they left the fiege fular Dignity with so much the more joy, by how much the sadder missortune he had been before bereaved of them. The Confuls having arrived at Messana, and joyned to themselves what ships they found there, being chiefly the Relicks of the last ship-wrack, sailed with two hundred and fifty ships

Polybius 1.36. of Veica which they had commenced, trimmed up the old thips, built new ones, and fludioufly endeavour'd to prevent the Romans from landing on the African shore. The Conful, used such incredible diligence, that by the beginning of Summer they had three hundred and fifty thins ready fitted and laden, with which failing to Sicily, when they found all things fafe there, and no danger, but that they were full of expectations and fears, they left Garrisons where most need was, and with the rest of their army steared towards Africa. But being by a tempest forced upon Coffura (an Iland between Africk and Sicily, near the Promontory of Lilybaum) they wasted the grounds there, took a City of the same name, and placeda Garrison in it. Then they fet forward to the Promonto y of Hirmans, which being in the mid-way between Carthage and Clupea, fhutteth in one fide of the Carthaginian Gulf. At this place the Carthaginian Navy met them, and a very sharp fight was entred into on both sides, when help came to the Romans from Clupea, which cotally inclined the victory, being before doubtful. An hundred and four of the Carthaginian flups were funk, thirty taken, and fifteen thousand fouldiers loft; on the Roman fide eleven hundred men were loft, and nine thips. The fleet then failed to Vica. where they landed their men, and pitched their Camp near the City, The Carthaginians likewife brought their torces thither under the conduct of Hanno, where in a land fight they were overcome with the loss of above nine thousand men. There were some Noble men taken prisoners, whom the Consuls reserved whereby to redeem M. Regulus and others who were in the like condition. They then confulted on present affairs, and conceived great hopes they might keep Africk in possession : Nevertheless the country round about being plunder'd and spoiled, they, fearing a samine, thought fit to return into Sicily, together with those Romans who had defended Clupea. They carried away very valt and rich spoils, which had been laid up in Clupes in the time of Regulus his prosperity, and much encreased by late victories. They had a fase Voyage into Sicily, and sufficiently fortunate had been the Consuls if they would have fet a bounds to their happinesse. But because in their return to Iraly they thought by the by to take some Port towns of Sicily, not regarding the ship-masters counsel (who advised them, Not to sail in those dangerous and rough leas against the coast of Africa, now Orion and the Dog Star were rifing) they fuffered fuch shipwrack by tempelt as hath hardly been heard of, of three hundred threescore and four ships, scarce fourscore, having cast out all their lading, were faved; much about the same number of horse-boats and other forts of vessels were lost. infomuch as the whole shore, even from the coast of Camarina (where the storm began) to Puchynus, was filled with the Corps of dead men, and horses, and pieces of broken ships. In this their hard distresse the humanity of King Hiero was no small comfort to them, who bountifully entertained them, furnishing them with cloths, and victuals, and tackling for their ships, and conducted them fafe to M. Jana. But the Carthaginians made no delay to take advantage of this their misfortune, they presently regained the Hand and City of Coffura; and forthwith croffing over into Sicily belieged Agrigentum under the command of Carthalo, and no relief coming, they took it and demol fined it: A great multitude of persons were here slain and taken prisoners, the others, who escaped through the midlands into the territories of Syracuse. planted themselves in a Village near the Temple of Jupiter Olympus. Neither were they out of hopes of recovering the whole Hand, but that the Romans affociates confirmed and firengthened themselves against present sears, hearing what diligence was used in preparing a new Navy; for the Confuls were to intent upon the work, that with wonderful fpeed, in the space of three moneths, an hundred and twenty thips were built. With these (n. Cornelius L.F. C.N. Scipio Afina, and A. Atilius A.F. C.N. Calatinus being Confuls again, having made a new leavy of flout fouldiers, were commanded with the first opportunity to fet to fea. This Cn. Val.Max.6.9.11 Cornelius was a great example of the Inconstancy of Fortune, and of Patience in Adversity, for having seven years agoe, when he was Consul, been circumvented by the crast of the Cartha. ginians, and fuffer'd captivity, imprisonment and chains, and whatsoever milery is incident to ma kind, he now refumed not only the other Ornaments of his degree, but likewise the Con-to the mouth of the River Himera, and took by treachery the Town of Cephaladium, fome Diodorus eighteen miles distant upon the same shore: From Drepanus (for thicker they had steared Culverius Sici. their course) they departed without effecting their purpose, being not able to take it on the sudden, and Carthalo having fent thither supplies in case of a siege. Being not thereby discouraged from farther attempts, they happily accomplished another design of greater moment. They Polybina directed their course to Panormus, the principal City of the Carthaginians jurisdiction, and possessing the Haven, sate down under the very Walls, and the Panormitans resussing to yield, they encompassed the City with a Ditch and Bulwark. The nature of the ground sayour d their intendments, yielding plenty of materials and wood for their works, which being finished they began the affault, and battered down with their Engines a Tower by the sea side, and the souldiers entring by the breach, with great flaughter of the enemy, took the outward City, which was called New Panormus; the old City did not long hold out, for a great number flying this ther out of the new City, bringing along with them more terror then provisions, they were dejected with confideration of their present danger, and searing sudden scarcity, sent messengers to the Consuls with proposals to yield up all but their bodies; the Consuls knowing the wants of the belieged, accepted not the conditions unless they would redeem themselves at a certain price. Every head was valued at two Mina, fourteen thouland persons were ransomed, the reft, being thirteen thousand were fold together with the plunder. This Victory was very glorious of great and sudden concernment, for hereupon many Towns on that coast, some also far distant, cast out the Carthaginian Garrisons and submitted themselves to the Romans. The Jetines began, and Polybina their example was followed by the Soluntines, Petrines, Tyndaritans and others. Affairs being thus transacted and a Garrison left at Panormus, the Consul returned to Messana and so to Rome. The Carthaginians lying in wait for them at their return, surprised some thips of Burthen with Zonarus

At Rome there was two Naval Triumphs made immediately one after another, by the former Marmora Cayear Confuls (whole command was prorogued) over the Coffurans and Carthaginians : Serv. pitolina. Fulvius triumphed the thirteenth of the Calends of February, and M. Aimilius the day after. The five hundreth year after the foundation of the City a fruitlesse expedition was made into Africa. Cn. Servilius Cn.F. (n.N Capio, and Cn. Sempronius Ti. F. Ti. N. Blasus being Coululs, croffed over into Sicily, where having in vain attempted Lilybaum, they di- Polybius · rected their course to Africk with two hundred and threescore ships, and failing along the coast Zonara and fometimes landing, they took many Towns and got great plunder. They effected nothing Orofins. 43.9. of greater moment, being hindred of entring into the most convenient Towns by the Carthaginians who every where met them with very good courage, having recovered whatfoever M. Regulus had possessed, and punished the revolters. For Hamilear having ranged through Numidia and Mauritania, had reduced and quieted all that Tract, imposing a fine of a thousand Orofine Talents of filver, and twenty thousand Oxen, and punishing the prime men who were thought to favour the Romans, three thousand whereof were Crucified. But the enemies encounter was not so formidable to the Romans as their own ignorance in the places, and their dangers in Fulvium Urh. the sea, for failing to Menine, an Iland of the Lolophage, near unto the leffer Syrin, they ftruck upon shallow places, the Tide going out, and were detained till the ships being emptied of Polybia their burthens, were by the Tide coming in again relieved from extreme danger. Having therefore escaped so great a distresse, and fearing those dangerous places, without delay they failed solimus a 30 away as if they fled, not that no leffe a calamity attended them then what they had avoided. To Panormus indeed they returned very fafe; but in their Voyage to Italy, as they failed about the Promontory of Palinurus, which reacheth out into the sea from the Lucanian Mountains, a terrible from arising sank above threescore great ships, together with many horse-boats and Diodorus vessels of Burthen. The City being exceedingly grieved at such frequent losses, as if the very winds and water denyed the Romans the Soveraignty of the sea, the Senate decreed that their Zonaras Navy should conflit but of threescore ships, for the guard of Italy and transportation of provifions to their Army in Sicily. Nevertheleffe this misfortune hindred not one of the Confuls Fafti, Capital. C. Sempronius from his Triumph over the Carthaginians on the Calends of April, ten dayes after Cn. Cornelins Proconful had made the like Triumph. There were Cenfors that year created at Rome, but L. Posthumius L. F. L.N. Megellus (who was likewise then Pretor) dying in his Office, the other Censor D. Junius D. F. D. N. Pera did also lay down his Office.

The next Summer C. Aurelius L.F. C.N. Corea, and P. Servilius C. F. Cn. N. Geminus being Confuls, croffed over into Sicily, and amongst other Towns took Himera (upon the Rivet Himera) but void of Inhabitants, whom in the night time the Carthaginians had carryed away. Yet it was a great advantage to have the possession of so considerable a place, and hereby the Romans wiped away that difgrace they had heretofore received at this City, for they had failed of their expectation of taking this City (named likewife Therma) by the covetouinels of their fouldiers. [For a certain Captive within the City, to whom was committed the cuftody of one of the Gates, that he might thereby recover his liberty, did upon an appointed night give admittance to the Roman Souldiers, who were fent to take possession of the City. When the chief of them were entred, they defiring to ingross the richest spoils unto themselves, gave order, To have the Gates fout again and no more men to be let in. Whereupon the Thermitans receiving an Alarme took arms, and the Romans by reason of their small number not able to

ding to their Folly, beingevery man of them flain.] Himera being thus reduced into the Roman Power, (. Aurelius the Confull thinketh of belieging Lipara, which had been fo often in vain attempted; And in order thereunto gathereth together the choicest fouldiers they had in all Sicity and borrowing thips of Hiere, transporteth them into the Liparaan Iland. From whence having occasion to return to Messana, to consult the Entrailes of Sacrifices, he deputed his Lieutenant in the fiege his Kiniman P. Aureolus Pecuniola (fome fay Q. Caffius a Colonell) with order, diligently to defend the Workes, but otherwise not to fight at all: But he, not observing the Confulls advice, and thinking it would much redound to his Credit, to take Lipara in his absence, made an Assault upon the City, and that to his Cost, for, not being able to Masterit, he loft many men, and by a fally out of the Town had one of his Forts fet on fire, having also much adoe to defend his Camp. But upon the return of Aurelius, Fortune wheeling about, there was a very great flaughter made at the taking of the City, after which he proceeded to the punithment of the Colonell, whom he commanded to be beaten with stripes, and take pay among the common fouldiers; a very remarkable severity, whereof he made some other proofes in the time of his Confullship. When Lipara was taken, an Immunity was granted to the Posterity of Timalitheus (once Governour of these places) that they should for ever be free from all Taxes and Tribute; wherein the Romans manifested the constancy of their Thankfulness, not to be outworne by time; because when the Pirates of Lipara had taken a Golden Cup, which they had fent to Apollo of Delphos, Timafithens caused both it, and the Embassadours who conveighed it, to be fafely conducted into Greece, and the Men back again to The Romans afterward belieging Ereta a very strong Castle, with forty thousand foot, and a thousand Horse, were neither able to take it, neither durst they fight with the Carthaginians: For fince the misfortune of M. Regulm, the Romans flood fo much in fear of the Elephants that they alwayes avoided Battell. Oftentimes within the Territories of Lilybaum, and often in the Selinuntian fields, they have flood in Battell-array about halfe a mile from the Enemy, yet durit neither venture according to their wonted Courage, to begin the Charge, or descend into plain and open ground, but still kept themselves in craggy and difficult places. The Carthaginians hereupon erecting their Spirits, (feeing they now had Confidence in their land Army and knew the Romans had had greater loffes by tempetts at Sea, then themselves by unluckie fights, especially having intelligence of the Senates Resolution to set out no more Navies) conceived hopes of recovering Sicily, if they did but fend good flore of land and fea-forces thither. But their main impediment was want of Money, the late continuall Warres having exhaulted their Old store, and confumed their new raised Taxes. They sent therefore Embassadours to Prolomy King of Egypt, to botrow two thousand Talents of Money. The King being loath to offend either them, or the Romans (being both in League with him) offered himself as a Mediatour of Peace between them: But notwithstanding all importunities he denied the Carthaginians Requeit faying He would willingly helpe a Friend against an Enemy, but thought it not sit to affift Livie Ephon. one Friend against another. About the same time at Rome Tib. Coruncianus was the first of the Plebeians who was created Chief Priett. The same year also Censors were created, because the Duties of that Office could not last year be performed, one of the Cenfours dying, and the other laying down his Commission, M. Valerius M.F. M.N. Maximus Mesalla, and P. Sempro-Tabula Roma- nint P. F. P. N. Sophus made the feven and thirtieth Luftration. Two hundred ninety feven thousand, seven hundred ninety seven Citizens were rated. This was a sad and severe Cenfourthip, for in taking a view of the Senate, Thirteen were degraded, four hundred young Knights had their horses taken away, and made common stipendarie souldiers. This came to pass by the Complaint of C. Aurelius the Consull, who informed the Censours, That in Sicily, when need required, being commanded to their Duty, they had refused to obey. The Confull, not content with this Revenge for their contempt of Discipline, prevailed likewise with the Senate to keep back their Pay. And truely as times then went, the confideration of his feverity and strictness of Discipline, as well as his exploits performed, was occasion of his Triumph made over the Carthaginians and Sicilians upon the Ides of April. The next year was fuller of Threats, then action: For great preparations being made on both fides, and each standing in fome fear of the other, the whole fummer paffed away without any confiderable thing done. L. Cacilius L.F. C. N. Metellus, and C. Farius C. F. C. N. Pacilus, being Confulls, transporting their Legions over into Sicily, neither themselves much provoked the Enemy, or were provoked by them, though Astraball a new Carthaginian Generall was lately come thither with two hundred thips, an hundred and forty Elephants, and twenty thousand Horse and Foot. This business caused the Senate to enter into Consultation of preparing another Navy; for the Publick Treasures began to be exhausted by protracting the Warre, and since the Missortune of M. Regulus, the Legions degenerated from their wonted Valour, and though all things should succeed prosperously at Land, yet 'twas manifest, the Carthaginians could not be kept off Sivily, folong as they had the fovereignty of the Seas. Resuming therefore their former refolutions, they began to put confidence again in their ships, and with all care to trimme the old, and build new ones In the mean time L. Merellus being left at Panormus, C. Furius returned to Rome, to the chuing of the new Confuls, who were C. Atilius CM. F. M. N. Regulus.

and L. Manlius A.F. P.N. Uulso, to these was committed the charge of preparing the Navy and men for the ships; L. Metellus was continued in his Command, with Commission to manage Polyb. 1.39 the War in Sicily as Proconful.

Aldruball understanding that one of the Romans Generals was absent with half their forces, and computing with himself, that though the Armies had long stood in Battel aray one against the other, the Romans had out of fear declined fight, being now no longer able to bear the complaints of his own fouldiers who accused him of cowardize, he drew all his forces out of Diedores Lilybaum, and after a long and difficult march through the Selinuncian Territories, he invaded those of Panormus and there pitched his Camp. It fortun'd, that the Proconful, with the remainder of the Roman strength was then at Panormus to guard their Associates, now harvest grew on, in reaping and carrying in their grain. He, having inteligence that some of the enemies spies lay secretly at Panormus, commanded every man in the City to meet together in an Zonardo Assembly, then giving order they should examine one another, and question those who were least known, What they were, or what business they had at Panormus, found out the spies and feized on them. By them he understood the enemies defigns, and observing there was more rathness then good counsel in their expedition, pretended great fear, and kept himself within the works of the City, that so he might encrease their soolish considence. Whereupon Asaraball growing bolder, advanced his forces, spoiling and burning all the corn in the fields, and marching up even to the walls of the City. The Proconful regarded neither the lofs fullained nor the difgrace thence redounding, foreseeing that if he did a little longer forbear, the Carthaginians would sufficiently satisfie him for both with good Use. Above all, he thought good to expect till they croffed the River Orethus, which runneth on the South fide of the Town, and then he Flagellus de had contrived a fure and fudden Victory. To effect this, as all other things were ordered to fig-rebus Sieulis. nifie his fear, so he placed but few souldiers upon the walls, desiring that the enemy should not Frontinua understand either the courage or number of his men. This counsel succeeded according to his Strat. 3.17 expectation, both the enemy by his confidence, and fortune by a fudden chance furthering the defign: For Afdraball Forded the River with his Foot, Horse and Elephants, and planted his Camp close under the walls of the City, with fo much contempt of the enemies Cowardize, that he pitched his Tents without any works of defence about them, thinking there was no need of Diedorm

Thither the Sutlers and Merchants bringing great plenty of Corne and Wine, the Mercenaries drank stoutly, and elevating their voices according to their several dialects, in much noise and confusion gave good notice of their present temper, that they were not very sober. Then Polybins did the Proconful think the fittest time to fend those his men who were ready armed to provoke the enemy to fight, and it succeeded so happily, that still sending out by degrees fresh supplies, Afdrubal's whole Army at length came out of the Camp. L. Cacilius the Proconful placeth part of the light armed men before the Trench, giving order, If the Elephants approached to fling their darts at them, and if they found themselves fore pressed to retire into the Trench, and fling their carrs at them, and it into journa terminatives jour project to retire this the 1 commanded to carry darts and weapons, and fling them over the wall that the light armed men should not want plenty of them. Himlest with his companies completely armed, stood in Rank and File within the gate over against the enemies right Wing. They who were already engaged sometimes being overpower'd in number retreated in good order, fometimes being affilted by supplies from the Town did maintain the fight. When the Rectors of the Elephants desiring in

But then a shower of Arrows slying from the walls, and fresh light armed men assaulting them with Spears and Darts, the Elephants being wounded began to rage, and betaking themselves which way soever anger and pain led them, turned upon their own men, trampled under foot, routed and diforder'd whole companies of arm- Frontinus emulation to feem Authors of the Victory as well as Afdrubal, and advancing with their bealts, beat back those who opposed them, and rashly pressing upon them (as they retired

Whereupon the Proconful crying, This is the time of the long look't for Victory, issueth out, and being fresh and in good rank had an easie victory over the confused multitude of the enemy; there was a great flaughter made both in the field and in the pursuit, their calamity Polybins being encreased by a sudden chance which one would have thought of advantage to them : For Diodoru about the same time the Carthaginian Navy appearing at shore, the whole multitude trembling Zonarus and blind with fear, promiscuously ran thither as to the only refuge, in which hurly burly many were trodden under feet by the Elephants; many venturing to swim, and many too haftily scaling the ships and tumbling down perished in the sea. Neither before this time nor after it, amongst all their prosperous exploits, had the Romans any Victory more glorious; whereby the Romans refumed their former confidence and courage, and the enemy was so disheartened the Romans refumed their former confidence and courage, and the enemy was 10 dilheartened with fear, that they calt off not only all hopes but all thoughts of a land Army fo long as that Ording 3.9 War lafted.

Twenty thousand Carthaginians are said to be slain, six and twenty Elephants were presently taken, and afterward all the reft. For the Proconful thinking it hard for his ignorant men to eatch the beafts being loofe and enraged, commanded a Cryer by Proclamation to promife, Liberty and safety to any prisoner by whose means the Elephants should be taken; hereby laying first hold on those who were most gentle and familiar, by their help they easily brought in the reft. L. Metellus fent them all to Rome, having invented a pretty way for their transportation; for his ships not being fit for the purpose, he gathered and bound together many Hogsheads, faltning a Rafter between every two that they should neither dash together nor yet part one from the other, then planking them over, spreading earth and durt upon them, and erecting walls on each fide in the form of stables, the Elephants otherwise very fearful of failing by water. entred them and were fafely conveighed to Rhegium.

Aldruball from this overthrow escaped to Lilybaum, but being condemned at Carthage while he was absent, and afterward upon his return apprehended, he was accordingly executed. The Carthaginians now confidering their Armies were routed, their Elephants taken, all Sicily lok except Lilybaum and Drepanus, that the Romans having again fet out a Navy, were very potent both at land and sea, began to think of Peace, willing to accept of it on any tolerable conditions. Whereupon they remembred M. Regulus and the conditions he once propounded to them. and perswaded themselves that by his means they might prevail either for peace or at least for what they next defired, an exchange of prisoners; nothing doubting but that for his own fake he would effectually interpose himself in such a business: For what man can be imagined so obstinate as not to free himself from the miseries of a Gaole, and desire to see his dearest relations, and enjoy his Liberty, Country, Dignities and Honours? M. Regulus hath a wife and children at Rome. frienas and kindred in the Senate and publick offices, a Coufin German now Conful, he is both much beloved by the Senate and people of Rome for his former victories, and pitied for his affilitions; if therefore he beareth any good will to himself, or findeth any respect from his friends, no man certainly will be more earnest in prosecuting, or is more likely by favour to iffest such a designi. He accepted the employment, not out of any hope or desire to do himself good, as afterward appeared, but that he might in person the more effectually move the Senate to have a care of the Commonwealth. So being joyned with the Carthaginian Embaffadors, when he was come to the City, he would not enter the Gates though much entreated by the Romans, alledging, The Custome of his Country to give Audience to the Embassadors of an enemy without the City. The Californ of the Country to give Anaence to the Embalfacts of an enemy without the city. Inc. Senate being accordingly affembled, he amongst the Carthaginian Embalfacts delivered his Message, That himfelf also being by the War a servant to the Carthaginians, had command from this Qualiforn to propound chiefly. That the war may be concluded upon what terms should seem sit to both parties, or that at least an exchange of prisoners would be granted. The Embalfactors presently withdrawing, he sikewise accompanied them; neither, though he was earnestly folicited, would be he present in the Same act he dates of the Message. would he be present in the Senate at the debate of the business till the Carthaginians affented to it. Then fitting filent till his opinion was required, he thus expressed himself, "Conferint Fathers, "I am still a Roman: my Body indeed, as Fortune would have it, is in the power of the enemies, but my Soul, not subject to Fortune, is still the same. Following therefore the reason of my Sonl, which is my own, rather then the inclinations of my Body, which is anothers, my advice is, You would neither exchange priloners nor conclude a peace. For to reflore the * Captives while the war continueth is disadvantageous: They have no Commanders in hold but my felf who am an old man, you have many, and those young, amongst which are some 'no way to be despited. And to finish the war, unless upon very ample terms, or without a *complete universal Victory, as it becometh not your Wildom, so it is pernicious to the Commonwealth. I know you meet with many difficulties in managing the war, for no great affairs can be transacted without great pains and cost : But if you rightly consider the state of Car-'thage, you will find all things tending to victory to be much the better on your part. We were indeed once overcome in a great Battel, whether it were my fault or fortunes; but we have ' so often routed their Armies, that the confidence they had assumed upon my overthrow is now, by the Victory at Panormus, preffed down to the utmost despair. They have lost all Sicily, ' except one or two Cities, and in the other Ilands their condition is naught. You have a Navy "which they dare not encounter, fo that in that part of the war ye are also superiours. And the losses ye have sustained by Tempest hath not bereaved you of so much strength as it hath 'taught you Circumspection. The want of money perhaps is equal on both fides; but the Ita-· lians are more obedient to you then are the Africans to the Carthaginians, whom as they ne-'ver truly loved, fo have they of late learn't to hate more perfectly. For not being provoked by any fuch injury they revolted freely to me, but now fince their former mafters have wasted their Grounds plundred their Cattel, exacted their Monies and flain their Nobles, what do ' you think they can more defire, then that a new Army would come from hence into Airica?

But that your leavyes of men are easie and large, that your souldiers are valiant, of the same Language, the same Mind, the same Manners, Religion, City and Kindred, I take to be so great an advantage, that if in all things else ye were exceeded, this one only thing would be sufficient to balance the war, and make the Victory doubtful on the enemies fide, for what help is there in a company of Mercinaries against such a force? and if there were any, the

Carthaginians have bereaved themselves of it by their cruelty, and they have made it now as difficult to hire strangers, as it was before to govern them. Xanthippus to whom Carthage is indebted for its preservation, having been so ingratefully and treacherously used, is sufficient warning to others how they lend their affiftance to fuch a people who know not how to recompence the greatest defert but by the greatest injuries. Nay, the very common and meanest

Barbarians, a Brutish and slavish fort of men, will be deterred by Cruelties so often exercised upon their Feliowes, who have been sometimes murthered by hangmen, or their fellow Souldiers, fometimes exposed into barren and uninhabited Hands, receiving instead of the pay they have fought for, most inhumane punishments, and horrible deaths. And this Conscript Fathers is my Opinion, that neither Peace is to be made with Carthage, nor yet an exchange of Prisonersgranted. This Counsell displeased not the Senate, if it could have been executed with the safety of him who gave it; but the more he neglected himselfe for the Common good, the more they pitied him, and manifeltly inclined upon any termes what foever to restore so Gallant and Generous a Person to his Country. And voices were given out, that seeing he was now so happely return. Transit Meses ed from foreign Capivity, be might labifully carry in the City, or be detained there. The Familiated-High Priest likewise affirmed, that he might stay, without incurring the guilt of Parjury. But trepium, be to the Amazement of the Senate it selfe, with a sierce Spirit, and severe Countenance, proceeded, faying. Why do ye not resolve this doubt? follow my Advice and regard not me. For my part I am resolved Eutropius b.6 onot to live in that City, where after an African flavery, I cannot maintain the dignity of an honest Citizen, and if I should desire it, my sidelity would hinder it, the remembrance of my sitiat b.a facred Oath would hinder it, and my Reverence of the Gods, by the Invocation of whom I affured the Carthaginians of my return: And should I forswear my selfe, I fear that Revenge would be taken not only on me, but on your felves, and the whole Roman People alfo. As for my selfe, I am not e ignorant that great and exquifice torments are prepared for me at Carthage. But to deceive a truft, I think to be worfe then all of them, for this would indeed hurt me, as for the Torments they hart only something about me. I hink not that man milerable, who is able to endure milery. Slavery Reproach, Contempt, Griefe Hunger and Watching, I never yet efteemed evill, but now by a long cuitom they have left off to be troublesom to me. That they are tollerable, I have learn't by fuffering them; and if once they be intended to that degree, as not to be born by Man , Death will quickly free me not only from them , but from all other Calamities. Nothing therefore is to be feared for him who feareth not Death, which is easie at 'any time to obtain, and truely I had infliced it on my felfe, but that I thought it the part of a man rather to overcome forrow then to avoid it. I have fooken these few and consused words, that ye may understand, I am not to be perswaded from my Opinion, and withall that you should not bewaile me as an unfortunate and miserable Man: My Resolution is easy and con-'flant : 'Tis my care to return to Carthage , what I shall there suffer I leave to the Gods.

Wonderfull was the constancy pad Agelliof this Man, who rather then swerve from the Rule of Honesty, did with more earnestness purfue Contumelies, Torments and Death, then others avoid them, a true and profitable Lesson to Posterity, That those men only are prepared to endure any Torments, and are constant in their honest resolutions, who have a sense of their own nobility, and think themselves borne not onely for this world. For certainly M. Regulus would not willingly have undergone fo great mileries, if he had not thought that after Death there are great Rewards for the Virtuous, and great Silimb.6 punishment for evill men. with great honesty and Honour: He was a man of great Integrity of Manners, of an Invincible Spirit, and for his Counfell not to be despiled, wherein neither his own nor after ages could accuse him, but that he seemed not very moderately to bear his prosperous Fortune, and that by denying the Carthaginians request he was the occasion of the wars continuance for many years after to the great detriment of both Cities. But he wiped off this his fault by his other many egegious virtues, and chiefly by his wonderful conftancy at his death, being more happy in fuffering calamitie then if he could have avoided it. The Senate hearing the news of his death . and the Barbarous cruelty of the Carthaginians, delivered up the Noblest of the Captives to Marcia and her children, whom they that up in an Engine thrust through with sharp irons, re-folving to put them to the like death as Regulus had suffered; for five whole daies they had no food allowed them, in which Boffar with grief and hunger pined to death , Hamilear being stronger in body continued five dayes longer, thut together with the carcasse of Bostar, with sustenance fufficient only to prolong his miferable life, Till at length the Magistrates understanding what was in doing, did restrain their cruelty, commanding that the Ashes of Bostar should be conveighed into his own Country, and that the other prisoners should be handled with more mercy. Whereby appears a remarkable difference of manners in the two Cities, in that the one being not unjuftly offended, nor able with fecurity to offend, with horrid punishments extinguished that virtue they ought to have reverenced; the other mitigated a most just revenge not regarding their own enraged grief, but the Rules of Humanity, and that moderation which becometh Illustrious Empires.

BOOK IX

PON the departure of the Carthaginian Embassadors the Consuls . having Order from the Senate to transport their Army into Sicily, did very readily obey, being highly incented against the enemy for M. Regulus his fake, and likewise provoked with emulation and conceiving great hopes from the Victory of L. Metellus Proconful. For they measured not the greatnesse of the businesse so much by the losse of the Carthaginians, who were much weakened by the loffe of an Army and fo many Elephants, but chiefly they were encouraged because the fouldiers, having successefully fought against the beasts, did now no more frand in fear of them. And hopes were conceived the war might suddenly be finished if opportunities were not neglected. The Confuls therefore with a Navy of two hundred thips, and four Legions failed to Panarouns, where taking in likewife the other forces and thips (unless what were left for the guard and fecurity of some places) they went to Lilybaum with 240 Beak. Etymologica in ed ships, threescore Barks of a shorter fize, called Corcurs, and many other vessels of all forts, with resolution to make an affault upon it. This is that famous fiege of Lilybaum, which beginning the sourteenth year of this war, lasted full ten years and at length was ended, neither with the furprise of the City, nor with its furrendry, but together with the whole War. afterwards produced when the Games were celebrated, were chased up and down the firew with speares headed with iron, that the People might accustome themselves to contemne those beasts they had heretofore so terribly feared. Virius Flaccus affirmes they were all slain, the Romans not caring to make use of them themselves, and thinking it no way for the advantage of the Common-wealth, to make a Prefent of so considerable a strength to any Prince. For there was greater flore of these Commodities then of money, which by the long continuance of warre grew very scarce. While these things hapned at Rome, the Consulls in Sicily affaulted Lilybanm with all their strength, and the besieged as stoutly resisted. The first attempt was against a Tower, which stood farthest toward the Libyan sea, this being demolished, they did 24 bins 1.42. by degrees proceed to those which were next, till they had destroyed six. For the more easy battering of the rest they began to fill up the Trenches, that they might draw over and plant their Engines. Though the labour were very great (for the ditch was threescore cubits broad, and Diodorus 24. forty deep) they did readily fet upon and diligently promote the work. The Carthaginians to Zonaras, hinder their delign, made holes on the infide of the Trench, out of which they cast the rubbidge Diodorus again, but, the heapes still encreasing, and the ditch at length made even with the ground, (by reason of the multitude of Labourers) they changed their Counsell, and erected another wall within the former: Himileo being at all Workes indefatigable, who besides the multitude of Inhabitants in the City, had ten thousand Mercenaries, and did by his wisdom, Vigilance Polybius: and constancy clude and overcome all the Enemies force and Stratagems. He suffered nothing to be out of order among his own men, nor any thing to be secure on the Enemies part; he built Work against Work, digged Mine against Mine, opposed Armes to Armes, fometimes he issued forth, fighting with Such resolution, that in these tumultuary skirmishes there were sometimes flain little fewer, then usually fall in fet Battells. The Romans undermineing the Foundation of the Walls, Himileo made his countermine over against the place where he observed the Romans to cast out earth, and opening their Mine he

An Oration made in feafon, hath certainly great power over the Minds of men, especially if the gravity of the speaker be mixed with truth and sincerity to be relied upon : Every one asfented to what Himileo spake, and chearfully offered their utmost endeavours to continue their polyb. fouldiers in their Duty. Himiles commending them, and furthermore encouraging them with hopes, commands every one to apply himselfe to his own some on an endeavour to keep them in subjection: He sendeth likewise along with them Hanniball, the son of Hanniball, who serished in Sardinia, and Alexon the Achaian; Hanniball to the Gaules, with whom he was acquainted, and very gratious, by Reason of his former conversation with them in the Wars; Alexon to other Marcenaries of feverall Nations, by all whom he was equally beloved. These engaging their Words, that what sever Himiles had promised should be performed, so effectually made up the business, that the Traitorsa while after returning to the Walls, were not onely kept out, but beaten back with darts, and reproached for their Villany. So they returning to the Confulls without effecting their Delign, were nevertheless rewarded with Gifts, and had Land in Sicily bestowed on them:

The Belieged were afterward much encouraged by the comeing of new Auxiliaries. For the Carthaginians, though they were ignorant of what hapned at Lilybeum, did judge it fit to carry on affaires with much Vigour, therefore they commanded Adherbal the Admiral to provide a Navy and convey Men . Money and Corne to Libybaum. By him was fent Hannibal the fon of Hamilear, who having a fresh gale of wind from the Agulan Hands, sailed directly into the port of Lilybeum, his men ready armed for fight, and resolving to break through all opposition. The Romans had from the beginning of the fiege stopped up the mouth of the haven by finking fifteen ships, which they had for that purpose laden with stones, being therefore suddenly overtaken with the Enemies haft, and fearing left themfelves might by the force of the winds be driven into the Port, a place made unfafe for Navigation, they did not at all oppose the Enemie. Hannibal fafely entred the Harbour, and landing his men to the number of ten thousand, was received into the City with very great joy of the Lilybatans. The Romans feeing they could not prevent the Enemies Arrival, entred into Consultation how to defend their Works, which they thought Himileo would not delay to fet upon, having fo great a recruit of fresh souldiers; neither were they deceived, for Himilto intending to make use both of his new strenght and of the Courage of the others now revived, fummons all his forces together, and by hopes of Victory and ample rewards perswades them to make a sallie, and haveing disposed his Companies as the Occasion required, by break of day he assaulteth the Romans works in many places. The Romans were provided for them, and where they feared most danger had placed strong Guards. with these a very sharpe fight was begun, many fell on both sides, for they fought with great Courage and Resolution, and the number of men'was great on each part, no less then twenty thousand iffued out of the City, and were opposed by a greater Multitude of the Beliegers. For the Confulls having raised Auxiliaries from their friends in Sicily, were above an hundred thousand strong, whereof threescore, thousand were imployed in the fiege, the Residue being fent abroad to bring in Provitions. The fight therefore being very hot in every place, the sharpest Contention was about the Engines, some striveing to spoile them, other to defend them, with fo great Vehemence, that they spared their own lives no more then their Enemies. A great number of slaine men lay in that station where the Assault first began, the Clamour and noise of the Warriours, and Terrour of the Battel were much encreased by another Company, which brake out, with links and torches, rushing, through all dangers and Deaths, to set fire on the Engines : and the Roman foulders were very neer giving place to the fiercenesse of the Enemie, as no longer able to defend their Engines. But Himiles feeing many of his men perifh, and the Romans as yet nothing to remit of their Courage in reliftin g, founded a Retreat, and went first out of the Battel. Neither did the Romans pursue him, being content they had preserved their

The next night Hanniball, while the Enemy was weary after the fight, and observed not his Motion, secretly fiele out of the Harbour with the thips he came in, and went to Adherball at Drepanus, carrying along with him the Horsemen, who being of no use to the belieged in a upon the arising of Tempests, the Tide being very violent, destroyed their Work. But the very fame of the Work did for a time keep the Haven block' cup, which very much troubled the Carthaginians: that they could now by no means hold intelligence with their friends, neither durit any man undertake to visit the Lilybatans and give an account of their Condition, till at length one Hannibal firnamed Rhodius ingaged himself to enter the City, and having viewed all things, to returne with a faithfull Account. The promise pleased the Carthaginians : but they had little faith in it ; because they knew beside the heapes of rubbish, that the Haven was watched and warded by the Roman ships at Anchor there: But he having rigged a private ship he had, sailed to one of the Ilands over against Lilybaum, and the next day having a favourable wind, at ten of the clock in the day time, openly in the face of

prized many forragers who straggled far from the Campe, afflicted the Roman Affociates with

herball likewise much perplexed them at sea, suddenly falling sometime on the Sicilian, sometime on the Italian shore, leaving nothing unattempted whereby he might mischief the Romans.

Hence it came to pass that there was great scarcity in the Roman Camp, for they had almost no food left but onely the flesh of beafts, many died of Famine, and many more, as is usuall in

ded that one of the Confulls with his Legions should return to Rome to the Assembly of the People, that the other Besiegers might have the greater Plenty. After this the Romans again with greater pains and deligence endeavoured with earth and stones to stop up the mouth of the Haven, fortifying the Damme on both fides with strong pieces of timber

joyned together crofs wayes, and faitned with iron Anchors, to conteine the heap of earth and

flones from washing away: But their labour though great proved fruitles, for the sea was so deep, that whatsoever was slung in, was carried adde before it lighted right, and the enemy wondring at his confidence entred the Haven. But the Conful to intercept him in his return, in the night time placed ten choice ships on each side the Haven, five as near the mouth as might be. Hannibal trufting in the swiftness of his Vessel came out in the day time; the Romans were ready in the expectation of him, and with all their endeavours fet forward against him, but he was so much too quick for them, that not contenting to escape he moreover infulted over them, fometimes failing, fometimes wheeling about as if he would challenge them to fight. When he had often used this bold exploit, it proved of great advantage to the Carthaginian affairs, in that the Belieged were infinitely comforted with meffages from their friends, in that at Carthage they daily understood the state and progresse of things at Lilybaum as occasion required, and in that the Romans were so much ashamed and madded at the rashneffe of the men which they could not revenge. He was much helped in his defign by his knowledge of the Channel and the passages thereabouts; for between those Fenny and moorish places whereby is the passage to Lilybaum, he diligently observed a very safe and sure course for his ship. For when he came from the main Sea within fight of the City, he so turned his ship, that the Stern of it was toward Italy, and from the Foredeck the Tower of Lilybaum which was upon the shore, hindred the sight of all other Towers toward Africa, and this is the only fafe way of entring the Harbour with full fail,

And now many more being encouraged by the boldness and success of Hanniball, began to correspond with Lilybaum, till at length by a certain chance a vessel of great swiftness was taken. For though in other places the Romans Dams were carried away by the winds and water, yet in one place, where the Sea was somewhat shallow, they stood firm; there the ship striking and being detained was taken by the Romans, and being furnished with stout souldiers and good towers proved the ruine of Hamibalasso. For having entred the City in the night time and returning in the open day, he spied this ship every where waiting upon his motion, whereupon apprehending danger, at first he fled, but that being in vain, he made some opposition and was taken by the Romans.

The Romans being possessed of this ship, and observing the same course of entring the Haven, did afterward eafily hinder any other veffels from failing to Lilybaum. The Befiegers Diodorns 24. 1 began now very fiercely to intend their main business, and affaulting one of the Works near the Sea, drew the whole company of the belieged to defend that fide where the fform was made. whereby opportunity was given to other forces who were referved for that purpose to make an affault upon the contrary part and take the outward wall; but this proved in vain, for the Car-thaginian General feafonably coming with a supply of choice men, beat the Romans out with great flaughter. Another greater fortune gave the Besiegers hope of the universal Victory; there arole by chance very great guits of wind, which as it were on fet purpose blew hard upon the Romans works, shaking their very Rampires, and tumbling down the Towers built thereon, The townsmen were not ignorant of this, and thought now an opportunity given them by the gods of firing the Romans Engins, which they had so often in vain assaulted. The substance of the Engine was very apt to take fire, having been long felled and dried with the heat of the Sun.

The Romans were not flack in defending themselves, but not to much purpose, for the enemy was directed by the light of the fire which had seized on the Engines, and affished with the strength of the wind to cast their darts more surely and with greater force, the others received no less hinderance and danger thereby, then by the weapons of the enemies, for the wind being fierce and against the Romans blew smoke, and flame, and ashes into their mouths and eyes, and brought the enemies darts with greater violence upon them, whereas themselves by reason of darknesse were uncertain whither to direct their strokes, and by reason of the vehemency of the gusts were not well able to stand. So that all the Roman Engines and works either for digging of mines or Diedorus battering the walls were every one confumed by this fire.

Then was all hopes laid afide of taking Lilybaum by force, and the fiege had been prefently Polybius raifed but that Hiero, fending plenty of Corn and provision, perswaded the Romans to stay; where not intending to make any more forms upon the City, they did on every fide fence their Polybina Camp, refolving to commit the iffue of things to Time and Fortune. The Befieged likewife building up what part of their walls had been battered, were now the more encouraged to endure the fiege hereafter. These news were very fadly entertained at Rome; nevertheless they determined by war to make up what loffes by war they had fultained: and their refolution herein was fo immoveable, that, 'tis faid, a Senator was flain in the very Court because he made men-

Pulcher, and L. Junius C.F. C.N. Pullus. 'Tis fallely by some delivered, that this Cledius was the fon of Cacus. He, when he was come into Sicily and had taken possession of the Army at apud Valof. Lilybaum, affembled the Souldiers together, and sharply reprehended the former Confuls, That by their idleness and luxury they had trifled away time before Lilybæum more like men besieged then besiegers, without any fruit, and to the losse and dissonour of the Roman Majesty. He was a very crabbed fowr man, and being Violent by Nature, and Arrogant by reason of his Nobility, he was apt to let fall Speeches and perform Actions not well becoming a ferious fober man. He was very levere in panishing, letting passe no crime with pardon, but prosecuting even the

Diolorus. Po y ius Polib. 1. 46 Polyb. 1. 49 very smallest with too great severity; himself in matters of the greatest moment miserably failing, even to madness. For he followed the former Confuls course which he had so sharply condemned in damming up the Haven, and (what argued greater folly) he rashly and inconsiderately affaulting Drepanns loft a very gallant Fleet, no leffe by his own indifcretion then by the valour of Auherball. He perswaded himself and his souldiers, that the enemy not having intelligence of what supplies were come from Rome, might be unawares surprised at Drepanus; not believing that the Romans had either courage or strength sufficient to provoke them at sea. So that making choice of two hundred and twenty of the best ships with the stoutest Rowers, and most valiant men out of the Legions (for they offered themselves freely as to a short businesse and certain prey, Drepanus being not above fifteen miles from Lilybaum) he privately set fail about the third Watch, and had in the night time a prosperous Voyage, not being feen by the enemy. But at day break the ships being discovered not far from Drepanus, gave an Alarm to Adherball, because such a sight was there unusual, insomuch as no doubt was made but that it was the enemy who approached; the Carthaginians were forced either presently to encounter and enter fight, or to luffer themselves to be surrounded and besieged by the enemy; this latter they resolved against, because as it would have involved them in much trouble and danger. foit would have been imputed as a crime upon their miscarriage. Adherball therefore on a sudden called together his Sea-men, and by a Cryer summoning the Mercenaries to an Assembly, in a short but very pithy speech admonished them what hopes there were of victory if they would readily and chearfully take Arms, and what danger of a fiege was imminent if they declined battel When every man with one confent had agreed to follow his counsel, Adherball commending their obedience, forthwith gives order that they should take ship, and observing what course the Admiral steered (wherein himself failed) to follow it. Whereupon he before the rest saileth toward the main sea, going out of the Haven just under the Rocks hanging over it at the same time when the Roman ships entred on the other side. P. Clodius finding the enemy no whit difmayed, or declining fight, as he had hoped, but floutly prepared to defend themfelves, was much troubled, and retreated back with his ships to encounter the enemy in the open feas. But his were in no good order, but as chanceably they had outfailed one another, fome were entred the Haven, others were making toward it, and some were just in the mouth of it: Whereupon it came to passe, that while they all endeavour'd to make a sudden return, they dashed one against another, and struck their Oars together, till being got out of the Haven as well as they could, because they wanted time, they ranged themselves in Battel-array just under

The Conful, who had failed in the Rere before, now changing his Station, came before all and placed himself in the left Wing; but the Carthaginians failing by the enemies left Wing with five Beaked ships, tacked about sacing the Romans, and had the open sea on his back, other ships as they came he commanded to place themselves at a convenient distance, and when all were order'd according to his mind he fetteth forward against the enemy. For though they had the leffer Posphins 1.51. number of thips, to wit, but ninety armed; in other respects they did exceed, for their ships were better and their water men more skilful, they had likewife made choice of a most convenient place of fight, for as often as they were hard put to it they had free egreffe into the open fea, where they could easily by their swiftness avoid the enemy, or if he long pursued them, return and encompasse him. But the Romans being so near the shore had not the like convepience, they could neither fail into the main nor with fafety well retire, but as often as the enemy pressed upon them, they either stuck in the sands or endanger'd themselves upon the shore. Being therefore unable to break through the enemy by force and charge him in the Rere, by rea fon of the flowness of their ships and unskilfulness of the Rowers, and being cooped up in a narrow place not able from the Stern to help their fellows who were in danger, they were beaten

To these difficulties was added another cause of despair from their Religion, and they thought themselves worsted by the anger of the gods, because the Consul undertook to fight contrary to the indication of the Birds, adding likewife a Jear to his neglect; for because the Chickens did not eat, he commanded them to be flung into the fea, that they might drink though they would not feed. This occurrence made the fouldiers more flack and faint hearted, fighting, as they thought, with the ill will of the gods. But the author of all this calamity, when he had lost every thing else, he wanted neither wit nor boldness to preserve himself; for when he saw his ships in such numbers sank and taken, he slipt away between the shore and the enemy with thirty thips which flood next him. And that he might fafely arrive to his Army at Lilybaum, being to fail by some of the Carthaginians Guards, he adorned his ships in token of Victory. The Carthaginians therefore imagining the Conful had been victorious, and that his other thips would fuddenly follow, fuffered him fafely to paffe by , being themselves much terrified and dejected. The enemy took all the ships the Consul left behind, even ninety and three, together with the Souldiers and Rowers, except only those who striking upon the shore, cast themselves on land and fled. But in the fight a greatnumber were funk; for Clodius brought above two hundred from Lilybaum. This great victory cost the Carthaginians very little, for they lost not a man, much less a ship, and very few are said to be wounded; of the Romans eight thousand men were flain, and twenty thousand taken,

and carried them to Dunguage and carrying arrays are a first a first and carrying arrays and carrying arrays are a first a normus, and carryed them to Drepanus, and carrying provisions into Lilzbaum from the Territories of Drepanus, did plentifully relieve the belieged with accommodation of all forts. Neither here did this yeares fortune make a stop, but afflicted the Romans with another great calamity, whereby they loft not onely the prefent possession of the seas, but all hopes of regaining it. For the other Confull L. Janius coming out of Italy with many ships of burthen, laden with Corn for the Army, and fifty beaked ships arrived at Message, where he wet mith a great Polyb. 1.52 number of other Vessells, from the Army, and other parts of Sicily. Joyning himself with thefe, he made up a Navy of an hundred and twenty long fhips, almost eight hundred ships of burthen, and saileth to Syracuse. Being arrived thither, he sendeth the Questions before with part of the Navy to Lilybaum; himselfe remaineth at Syracuse, expecting those others from Messana, who were not able to overtake him, and taking in grain which his Midland friends brought down to the sea side. In the mean time Adherball having fent the Roman ships and Captives to Carthage (Fortune and Glory putting him forward to action) delivered thirty Diodorns thips more to Carthalo, who had brought feventy, with as many thips of Burthen from Africa, Politics, and sent him to drive out the Roman ships from the Haven of Lilybaum, or to fire or fink them. He at break of the day entring the Haven with great Terrour, some ships he boorded, and others he fired, in the mean time Himileo Governour of the City, made a fally with the Mercenaries upon those Romans who went to defend the ships, which caused great fear in the Camp. In fine Carthalo having destroyed not very many, carried away five, and directed his Course to Heracles. Lying there in wait to obstruct the Romans Voiage to Litybaum, he heareth newes Polyb of a confiderable Navy of all kinds of ships failing by. He therefore joyning other Commanders with himfelfe, made up a Navy of an hundred and twenty good ships, considing in which strength, and animated by former success, he presently maketh out of the Haven to meet the Enemy. By the shore of Gelsus the Navys came in fight Printed in the Investment of the Investment o one of the other, but the Roman Quæstors fearing a disadvantageous encounter, diverted their Polybius course to Phintiades, a Town in League with the Romans, at Phintiades there is no Haven, Dioder, onely the rocks running out into the sea afford a pretty safe riding for ships. Here the Romans lar- Polyb. ding, prepared themselves for the Enemies coming, having brought Engines of offence out of the Town, and placed them on the shore for safeguard of the ships. The Carthaginians at first refolved to have belieged the Enemy, thinking that out of fear they would have fled into the Town, and have left their thips for a Prey : But when the Romans flood floutly to their own defence, and that they found the fight full of danger, likewife not much trufting in a place somewhat inconvenient for the ships they desisted; and having taken a few Vessells laden with Diodorar provision they sailed to the River Halyens, not farre distant, there they healed their wounded Polyb. provinon they tailed to the Aiver traspent, not tarre quant, there every neared their wounded Pape, men, observing the motion of the Enemy. Other Writers following, I believe, Philins, 18- Dioder, fixed, the two Roman fulferined greater loss, that the Quafters being daunted at the first sight of Philinsia about 18 the first should being fourthen, and all other Veffells and their twent of Warre, that in the sight sifty round Viells, and therefore long ships were sank, and thirteen so splitt and souther a that they were made unfit for service.

Not long after the Carthaginians still abiding at the River Halyens, L. Junius the Confull, Polyb. 1. 54. having done his business at Syracuse, failing toward Lilybaum, about the Promontory of Pachymus, was discovered by some of Carebalo his ships, who thereupon with all speed makes out to meet him (being ignorant of all passages at Phinsiades) that he might fight him as farre from Quafter's Navy as might be, left they should come in for his succour. The Consul seeing the Enemy make up toward him, not daring to fight, nor being able to avoid them, drives his thips into a rough and troublesome creeke, neer Camerina, a greater fear overcoming this leffer, lest his whole Army should fall into the Enemies Power. Carebalo not daring to venter into the fame place, takes up his station at a certain Promontory, from whence he might equally intend himselfe against either Navy. A while after, when the Winds blew high, the Carthaginian shipmasters (skilfull in such Affaires) foreseeing a tempest, perswaded Carthalo to forsake that station, and steere to Pachynns, and so the Carthaginians, but not without great paines, avoided the force of the Tempett; But both the Roman Navys utterly perished upon the Orofius 4. Rocks, infomuch that of the whole shipwrack there remained not a piece of board of any use, Polyb. excepting onely two ships, wherein the Consull with the small remainder of his men arrived Diodor. at Lilybeum. All the thips of provision were loft, and above an hundred long thips; but Eutropius 2. part of the Armie was faved, leaping into the sea and swimming to shore. The Senate, who had lately called home P. Clodius the Consult, for his miscarriage in Sicily, hearing also of funius his misfortune, gave over all confidence in the feas, refolving neverthelefs with all their strength and Counsell to prosecute the Warre by land. They thought good to continue the fiege of Lilybaum; appointing certain men to take care of conveighing necessary accommodations in good feafon, to the Army there. Though the Carthiganians were Malters at fea, yet they were incouraged, in that at land they were superiour, and that almost all Sicily was either under their power, or in League with them : But they were not pleafed with their Confulls this year, neither did they think that things would succeed prosperously under the Confulls command, because they had profaned the Rites of Religion; for 'tis faid that L. Junius did Cicar de na:. likewise let saile neglecting the Indication of the Birds. They fled therefore to a new and unusuall Refuge, and created a Dictatour to go into Sicily; whereas, before this time, never any Livie Ephon one so impowered, had led an Army out of Italy. The Insolence of P. Clodius the Consuli was then very notable, and almost incredible; For being commanded by the Senate to nomi-Sucton in Tinate a Dictatour, he named M. Claudius Glycias, who was either his Scribe, or one of his Ser-Fafti Capitoni geants; as if he had not sufficiently offended his Countrey, by what losses he had brought upon it, unless he had likewise abused the Majesty of the Empire with such a scoffe. Whereupon the Poly b. 1.52 whole Senate being justly incenfed against him, he was forced to refign up his Office, and was referred to the censure of the People. What Authors Cicero had read, report he was condem-Cicer.de nat. ned , but others have observed, that when no Question was to be made but that the People would Val.Max.8.1.4 condemne him, he escaped by a sudden chance, a storme then arising which disolved the Assembly; And it feeming hereby that the Gods interposed themselves, they thought not fit to ordain any other meeting for the purpofe. But Glycias being forced to disclaim his Office, in that the Livie Epicon. City was ashamed to see a man of mean ranke to be in Supreme Dignity, was nevertheless admitted to all spectacles after this time in a Noble Man's Robes. In his room A. Atilius A.F. Fısti Capiteli-C. N. Calatinus was nominated Dictatour, who made L. Cacilius L. F. C. N. Metellus Master of the Hosse, he who had Triumphed over the Carthaginians. These two went indeed Plin.7.43. Dion. 36. into Sicily, but performed no very memorable action there.

In the mean time L. Junius, much troubled at his cross fortune, and defirous to wipe away the blot of his shipwracke, by some noble Exploit, watching all opportunities of Action, did at length find a way to take Eryx, by the Treachery of fome within it, whom he had corrupted by gifts and promifes. Eryx is the higheft Hill in Sicily except Etna, feituate between Panormus and Drepana, in that part of the Iland which lieth towards Italy, being more craggy toward Drepana. In the top thereof there is a Plaine whereon standeth the Temple of Venus therefore called Erycina, the Richest in all Sicily, just under the Top of the Mount, in the midst of the Assent, is a City of the same name, very hard to be approached unto, the way to which with much difficulty is overcome by long and narrow passages from the foot of the Hill. L. Innius therefore well understanding the nature of the place, appointeth a strong guard both upon the Ridge of the Mountain, and likewise in the narrow passages below being very safe himfelfe, and having the advantage with much ease to repulse the Enemy. He also encompassed &githallus with a wall, and itrengthened it with a Garrison of eight hundred men. But Carthalo landing his men there in the night time, stormed that Castle, and took and killed part of the Garrison souldiers, others escaped to Eryx.

The other passages concerning L. Junius are very doubtfully reported by Historians, Jome affirm he was taken by Carthalo at Agithallus: Others, that he killed himselfe fearing to be condemned for the loss of his Navy. There is no less uncertainty whether the Secular sports were Cicero de nat. celebrated this year, or fourteen yeares after, when P. Cornelius Leninius, and C. Licinius Va-rus were Confulls. I think it more probable they were celebrated this year, the fear conceived Livius Valeri. from their late overthrows, and hope of better fortune, inviting them thereunto, if their Religion were diligently performed. This was a very fruitfull year, infomuch as twelve pound of Auftin.de Civ. oile was fold for an Affis; In the mean time the Dictatourship being expired, or Aisling having refigned it up, C. Aurelius L. F. C. N. Cotta, and P. Servilius Q. F. Cn. N Geminus were chosen Consulls. The Consulls were prettie successfull in Sicily, yet obtained no great Victory, nor reaped any great profit for the Common-wealth They kept in the Carthaginians of Lilybaum and Drepanum, that they could make no large Excursions, nor so often as they had done, and took their Garrisons which were remote from the sea. Carthalo having made many attempts against them in vain, resolved at length to waste the Italian Coasts, that thereby he might divert the Confulls from Sicily; or if they refused to come back to succour their Country, depopulate their grounds, and take Cities. But fortune did not herein favour his delignes. For the Praton being fent out with the City-forces for defence of the Countrey, compelled him to return to Sicily without effecting his purpole.

Where when the Mercenaries mutinied for want of Pay, he exposed many of them in barren Ilands, and fent others to receive their Punishment at Carthage. The rest being incented hereby, began manifestly to revolt, so that a new warre was feared from them: But Hamilton who succeeded Carthalo, coming in season, set upon them in the night time, slew some, and drowned others; the remainder submitting themselves, and begging pardon he received into Grace. the interim Hamilear being returned out of Italy landed in the Panormitan Grounds, and pitched his Camp between Panormus and Eryx, in a place by nature very strong, it is called Epeirtle,

But the Romans having found the faith of Hiero King of Syracuse very constant toward them, and his merits great, freely remitted unto him that yearly Tribute they had in the former League compounded for, and made a perpetual band of friendship and society with him. In Bar, lay's Ar- an Hill craggy and full of clifts on all fides, exalting it felf from the circumjacent Region to a very great height; The top of it is not tharp, but continueth a plain of above an hundred furlongs, of a very profitable foil for the feeding of Cattel and bearing of Fruits, being open to the winds from lea , and void of all harmful and venemous creatures. Therein is a certain Hillock which supplieth the place of a Tower, from whence may be viewed all the grounds round about. Near it is a very convenient Haven for those that fail from Drepanns and Lilybeum to Italy, with store of fresh water. There are three wayes of ascending this Mount, two from the Land, one from the Sea, but all very difficult and full of obstructions. Here did Hamilear plant. his Camp with much confidence having no confederate City near him, and being in the midst of his enemies: But trufting in the strength of the place and his own courage and skill in Marshal affairs, he found the Romans work enough, and very well fetled the Carthaginian affairs, which now began to succeed well at home also. For another Carthaginian General, Hanno, who had a Diodorna 24 great emulation of Hamiltan's Virtue, to obtain honour, and employ the Army without the great elumation of Tamilear's virtue, to obtain honour, and employ the Army without the Commonwealths coft out of the enemies Country, invaded a port of Lybia about Heastomp?—Palyl. 1.73 ls., and having obtained the City, fent three thouland Hoftages to Carthage3, yet they had Disdaws. fome alay of this their properity, For L. Cacilius L. F., N. Matellus being the second time Conful, and Num. Fabius M. F. M. N. Butto being his Collegue, a Navy was built at the charge of private mea, which wasted the Coast of Africa. For though the Senate had a zonards gain resolved against sending out of a Navy, yet at the Citizens request they gave leave to have one prepared, upon this condition, That they should safely restore those thips which were built at the publick Charge, reserving the prey to themselves; so that a Fleet was set out very confiderable, which brought much terror and damage to the Coasts of Africa and affaulting Kings: Hippo, none of the meanest Cities, they fired the ships of Hippo and many buildings. In their return finding the mouth of the Haven chained up, by art and counsel they devised a way to explicate themselves out of present danger, for sailing with all the force they could, when they came near the Chain, all the men retired to the Stern, and fo the Fore-Deck being lightened eafily wafted over the Chain; then fuddenly running to the Fore-Decks and depressing them, the Stern likewise slid over, and they had free liberty of failing, having delivered themselves from imminent danger After this escape, they fought with the Carthaginian Navy, and prevailed against them. The

Roman Confuls divided their forces, L. Metellus besieged Litybeum, and Run. Febius, Dre-pannum. Not far from Drepannin, toward the South, lyeth an Iland, or rather a Rock, which Gutverim Sicithe Grecians call Pelias, we Columbaria, which the Conful stormed in the night time, and slew lia antique the Carthaginian Garrison there. Hamilear, who came to defend Drepanum, made no delay, Zonatas but at break of day fet forth to recover the place again, which the Conful observing, being nor able to relieve his own men, with his whole strength assaulted Drepanne, whereby drawing Hamilear from his design, he kept the lland in possession, and afterward made much advantage Prainters from its using, the reper the hand in potention, and atterward made much advantage of it in beligning Department, for he dammed up the fea, and joyned it to the Continent; and because the Walls of the City were weakest on that side, he there began his assaults. But the encounters between Hamilear, and these, and the Consuls of the following years, Palphine Palib. 1.57 thinks impossible to be described because they were so many, and judgeth it units, lest it might give an occasion of the like. For Hamilear, having his Camp at Epicite for almost three years together, had almost daily encounters with the Romans, especially when their Camp being before Panormus was scarce five furlongs distant from the enemy. For neither did they refrain from skirmishing, having their Armies so near; Neither did they ever come to the trial of a main battel having many hinderances, especially because their forces being equal and their Camps alike strong, they were likewise on each fide protected by the vicinity of their Camp, to which the party worlded might quickly retire. Hence it came to pass that as in fight somewere alwayes flain, to when the battel declined they had a fafe refuge to their Works. But while 2011 Drepanum was belieged, the Carthaginians Fleet insested not only the Sicilian but the Isalian shores; and Hamilear plundering as far as he could, wasted the Italian territories even to Cama. Many of the Romans Citizens being fallen into the Carthaginians power by these incursions. and the Sicilian fights, the Roman Commanders agreed with the Carthaginians for an exchange Polyb.1.56

I find two Colonies planted in Italy this year, one at Afulum the other at Afum. There was likewife a Lultration made at Rome (being the eight and thirtieth) by A. Asilim A.F. Foffi Capink. (N. Calasinus, and A. Manlius T.F. T.N. Neverthelefs the Sicilian army was duly recruited, the fipply being led by the Confuls M. Ottavim (F. M.N: Crafus (the fecond time Conful) and M. Fabiu C.F. M.N. Licinus. These had a very busic and difficult warfare, but not being able to dispossesse Hamilear of his strong holds, they performed nothing memorable. There was hardly any Noble Family in Rome but had had some relation to the Claudians, either by Cognation or Affinity, so that she wanted not Patrons to defend her, declaring, The Nobility of her boufe, the merits of Appius her father, the frailty of her fex ; that it was a thing unheard of for a woman to be called into Judgment: Neither was now the cause so great why a new custome should be begun against Claudia, which had not by any plot or practice offended the Majesty of the people, but only in a few words. On the contrary, the Tribunes alledged, 'What an 'impions and execuable speech she hath vented, ye are not ignorant, O Romans, neither is there any need of Witness, she her self confessing it; neither indeed can she denvit if she would, because the spoke openly and in publick, not reverencing either the Gods or the multitude of Citizens round about her. When therefore the crime is manifest, why should we doubt of L.29.69 [eq. ff. 'the punishment? Have not the Laws made sufficient Provision? Or while we read the Letter of the Law, shall we suffer our minds to be deluded in the Sense of it, 'Tis objected, That it is usufual thus to accuse a woman; if it be so, why it is unusual likewise for a woman thus to 'offend: Neither hitherto did our Commonwealth ever afford so wicked and impudent a woman. And we wish that there were now no need of making a new Precedent being desirous that (offences being avoided) the Law might lie hidden and quiet, rather then be made use of against the guilty with a profitable severity. But a City that intends its own establishment, " must of necessity observe the Laws, which they of all men ought least to pervert who would be esteemed the Princes and Pillars of the Commonwealth; who being skilful in the Laws canonot be ignorant, that though in most of them there be no mention expresly made of women, yet in these words, If any One, and the like, both sexes are equally comprehended. What wonder is it then if we believe the Law against Treason to concern both fexes, seeing this very Claudias is an example that both fexes may offend against it? But they Extenuate the businesse. and would have the crime feem small, because it was only in Words. What? this yet was wanting; she did not joyn her endeavours, counsels and actions with the Carthaginians; fhe did not raife Troops, arme Slaves, feize on the Capitol, nor actually with her hands effect that wickedness against the City which in words she expressed. Notwithstanding this, the Laws provide not only for the punishment of Deeds but of ill Counsels and designes allo; if indeed a mad man or an infant do hurt to any the Law layeth no hold on their actions: yet the mind and intentions of others in many causes is made as manifest by Words as by Deeds, She who made fo detellable a wish, what would she have done if it had lain in her power to have brought it. to pass? Unless we despite the Judgment of other men (which we have no reason to do) we shall find that in other places wicked wishes are accounted Crimes. At Athens, which for reputation of Wildom exceedeth all Cities of Greice, there was a man whose office was to provide necessary accommodations for Funerals, condemned, because he wished he might make great gains, which could not be unless a great number of Citizens died: Yet those words 'might admit of a more favourable Interpretation. But Claudia plainly, and without any 'ambiguity wished Destruction to the Citizens, Overthrow to the whole Army, and Calamity to the whole Commonwealth. Would my Brother were alive again! A naughty wish it is, if the had made it only for her brothers take; for why thould life be reftored to him by whose means formany Citizens loft their lives? who no leffe affronted the Commonwealth by his Arrogancy, then he did afflict it by his Rashness? who being by the votes of all men precondemned, avoided not the infamy of his judgment, but by accident escaped the punishment? Would you, if you were wife, have this man to live again, whose memory if you could hide in the same Grave with his ashes, it were your duty to do it? For as other Matrons do not vainly glory of the Egregious virtues and merits of their Brethron, fo would be be a shame to you if any shame or modesty be left in you. But let a Noble Lady be pardoned, though perhaps foolithly the hath defired her brothers company, if the did it out of any pious and charitable confideration. Yea, clearly absolve her, if the cause of her wish be not more abominable then the wish it felf foolish and insolent. For why did you wish your brother alive again? that you might be comforted with the countenance of a near Kiniman, that his labours might redound to your profit, his Authority be a protection to you, and his Honour a grace? None of all these. And what then ? Even that he might command the Navy again: This, this, wicked wretch, was the reason why you defired, as much as in you lay, to raise the Dead, to reduce Nature to its former habit, and unlock the Cloifters of the Grave that you might find a man by whom we might be deftroyed! "mercy on her, had she had any mercy toward you. But seeing she hath wished the death of *fome. the grief of others, that they should be childles and fatheries, nay, the general calamity of all: who will be so foolishly tender as to judge her hostile, cruel, inhumane soul worthy of any mercy? What great lamentations and complaints were made when the Cenfors upon the last Lustration gave in the number of the Citizens? Though many things these years last past succeeded prosperously, yet good men thought the Commonwealth in no very fafe or good condition by reason the number of the Citizens was so much decreased. But this woman nothing moved at the lofs of those who perished, therefore only grieveth because any *are remaining. She complaineth of the two great crowd in the City, she wishesh him alive by whose fault chiefly the number of Citizens is so small. But it may be said, The woman her felf being indeed unworthy your mercy, will ye not yet pardon her crime for her Ancestor's, for her Father's fake? Shall we then establish such a Law in our City, That if any man by any means do good to the Commonwealth his posterity shall have the liberty to offend it without punishment? Truly our Fathers were not of this Opinion, when they precipitated M. And now let them reckon sup the merits of the Clandian Family, even from the time of the Decemviri, or from the first · Original thereof, they shall find matter whereby to prove this woman like her Ancestors in pride and contumacy, rather then to make it appear the ought to be pardoned for their fakes. What cause therefore have these, or can any other man alledge why this woman ought to go unpunished, unless it be feared the City should loofe a woman of so good example? of which opinion if ye also are, O Romans, keep her, keep Claudia amongst you, that when our Matrons kneel at the feet of the gods, supplicating them for the Commonwealth in time of trouble, • The may hinder their devout Prayers by her Curses; that while they wish for Salvation for our Armies, the may wish Destruction, while they desire to see the souldiers return safe and sound, " The may defire to hear they are vanquished, captivated and flain; that while they folicite the gods that few or none may fall in battel, the may repine and accuse Providence if any return home. Keep the woman, that as other Matrons provoke and encourage their children and kinfmen, in emulation of Illustrious men, to Virtue, Courage and Love of their Country, " she may instruct hers by the example of P. Bulbus were made Confuls. Fafti Capital. There was a Colonie this year planted at Fregena, a Maritime City of Etraria, nine miles from Livie Epic. 69 Alsum whither one was led two years fince. These Confuls fought a very great Sea battell, Valleius 14. 18 the iffue thereof was profitable to neither Party, for the Carthaginians loft a multitude of thips Florus, 2.2, 10 and men; And a tempest bereaved the Romans of their rich spoils: In Sicilia affaires were managed with the same advice, and the same fortune as the year before. The Romans haveing an hard task not onely by reason of the Cragginesse of the places, but of Hamilear his boldneffe and fubrilty in martiall stratagems, whereby he so equally opposed the Romans, that he not onely defended what places he had possessed, and by frequent incursions vexed the Enemies affociates both on the Sicilian and Italian Coasts; but minding other things also, did every where support the Carthaginian Power even ready to fall, being very industroius, of a resolute Frontiess minde, and of excellent judgement in takeing seasonable Counsells. Desirous therefore to Strat..3.10 relieve the Lilybætans from fear and want, being more closely beliged by land, he commandeth part of his Navy to appear in the main fea, as iteering their Course to Lilybeam, which while the Romans failed out to Encounter, he flipt himselfe into the Haven, with some ships he had for that purpose placed where they could not be discoverd, and so strengthened and encouraged the belieged with his presence, and abundance of provisions which he brought. While the war was in this manner continued in Sicilie, A: Manlius. T. F. T. N. Torquatus Atticus and C. Sempronius T.F. T.N. Blasus being againe Consults, came and tooke charge of the Army. About this time the manner of their war was changed, not so much as ordered more closely and in Fafti Capital.

narrower bounds. The Romans (as hath been already declared) had planted a Garrison above the City Eryx upon the Top of the Mountaine, another below at the foot of the Hill. The natural frength and feituation of the place, with the helpe of these guards, seemed sufficient to secure that City from sear of any surprise. But the boldness and Valour of Hamilear, makeing any thing possible, which he listed to undertake, in a very short time reduced it into his Power. For he in the night time, fetting forward with his forces, and without noife afcend-ing thirty furlongs up the Hill, himfelf marching in the head of the party, furprised the Romans unawares, and haveing slaine greatest part of those he found in the Towne, he sent the rest ro Drepanum. From this time the face of things was very ftrange, and the warfare very hard and fevere, for Hamilear being now in the midft of two of the Enemies Garrisons, was himself befieged by them below while he befieged those above; both the Romans and the Carthaginians undergoing incredible paynes and danger, did for almost two years next insueing performe the office of most Valiant fouldiers; For the Camps being so neare there passed not a day, nay scarce an houre without alarmes and skirmishes, neither party all this while fainted or yielded. neither did Victory or overthrow part them; but ftill they continued equall and unvanquished, designeing in the mean time to prosecute the Warre at Sea al-

This year a Colonie was planted at Brundusum, in the Salentine Territories, twenty yeares Livie Epit. 19. after that Countrey was subdued by the Romans. About this time T. Coruncianus, who was the first High Priest of the Plebeians, died in a great old age, and in his place succeeded L. Cacilius Metellus. The next Consulls were C. Fundanius C.F. Q. N. Fundalus, and C. Sulficius C.F. Ser. N. Gallus. By them the war with Hamilear was mannaged in the same manner, and with the same fortune as before, onely the Mercenary Gaules, and others who kept Garrifon in Eryx, being discontented for want of Pay, and other injuries, endeavour'd to betray the City to the Romans, but not being able to effect it, they revolted to the Confulls, and thefe were the first Forreigners the Romans ever entertained into fociety of Armes. Notwithstanding this access of strength, they were not able by their Land-forces to finish the War, chiefly by reason of Hamilcars virtue, who could neither be circumvented by craft, nor vanquished by

Once more therefore they confulted about fetting forth another Navy to Sea ; For by no other meanes could the Carthaginians be kept from Sicily, unless they were mastered by Sea. And they were much encouraged in their resolution, by reason of their former success, when the Navy was fet forth at the cost of private men: But money was wanting, the Treasury being long ago exhausted with the charge of a continuall War. Then did the Noble Roman Spirit feafonably relieve the wants of the Common-wealth, fo generous were the Senatours, that in a time of publick danger they (corned to spare their private purses, out of which on the sudden more mony was raised then the building of a Navy required. Those who were riches did every manundertake to build a Quinquereme, fetting it forth compleatly manned and arm'd; others according to their estates joyned two or three together in the same design, upon this condition, that when the Common-wealth was restored to a better Condition, every man's money should be paid back again. By this meanes two hundred ships of five Oares on a side were made ready, according to the pattern of that Gally they had taken from Hanniball Rhodins. Great was now the expectation of all men, for being put to their last refuge, they resolved with this Navy of Necessity to hazard the Fortune of the whole War. While these thing were Livic Epitom. In doing, C. Lutatius, C. F. C. N. Catulus, and A. Posthumius A.F. L. N. Albinus entered the Consulship. A. Posthumius was then Priest of Mars, and therefore when he desired Tall 3.71.5. to cast lots for his Province, L. Metellus the High Priest would not fuffer him, pronouncing it unlawfull for a Prieft to depart from the place of his Office, and leave the Ceremonies unper-Val. Maximus Citero Phil. 1 formed, which was likewise allowed of, and agreed upon by succeeding Generations. The Se-8, nate likewise at the same time shewed a like Example of desending their Countrey's Religion, for they forbad C. Lutatius the Confull to ask counsell at Preneste, and mannage the Affaires of Val.Max.1.3'1 the Common-wealth by direction of outlandish Auguries. Then intending their minds upon the War (because both the Confulls could not be spared with fafety of their Religion, and one feemed not fufficient to bear the whole burthen) they ordained one of the Pratours (this being the first year wherein they began to create two) to accompany C. Lutatius, and it fell to the Lot Europius b.2 of 2 Valerius Falco. These gathering together all the Publick and private ships to the number Diederus 24.3. of three hundred, with Ferry-boats, and other Vessells to the number of seven hundred; associated Polybius 1.59. as Winter was over, failed to Sicily, whither being come, they find both the Lilyberan and Drepanitan Havens open for them; For the Enemy not expecting any Navy from Italy, were returned to Africa with all their thips. The Confull animated with this proferous beginning, being by nature full of fpirit, hating Idlenes, and desirous of Action, besieged Drepanum, ratfing Workes against it; in the mean time not omitting to train up his Sea-fouldiers, daily exercifing them (as forefeeing sadden use of them in fight) insomuch as they who were utterly ignorant of Maritime Affaires and chances, seemed sufficiently prepared for any Encoun-Confull Valiantly fighting in the head of his men, received a deep wound in his thigh; whereupon his Souldiers troubled at his fall, and running in to him, miffed the opportunity of taking the place, when it was even almost in their hands: Before the Consull had recovered the use of his foot, newes was brought of a great Carthaginian Navy approaching, to the number of four Europius hundred thips, stored with provision for their Army, with a very great strength of fouldiers, Florus. 2.34. and abundance of Armes and Money. Hanne, a Carthaginian Noble Man, was Commander in Polyb. 1.60 Chiefe; his chiefe care was to get fafe to Eryx, eafe his Thips of their burden, and fo manning them with flour Souldiers from Hamilear, to return and fight the Roman Navy. His delign was well contrived, but prevented by the wildom and circumspection of C. Lucation the Con- Livie 23,1445 full, who knew it would be of great moment to the Victory, to encounter the Carthaginians while their ships were heavy laden, and encombred with the burthen of their own provisions. Therefore upon the Ides of March, filling his ships with choice fouldiers, he faileth to the Ilands Eutrepius Egates, over against Lilybaum, where he discovereth Hanno coming from Hieronesus; then Diodorus encouraging his Sea-men and fouldiers he appointeth next day for the fight: But at break of Lin day he began to doubt, because the wind was arisen favourable to the Carthaginians, and contrary to himselse. Weighing then the Reasons on both sides, he thought it safer to fight with the winds, and Hanno while he was alone, and had his ships laden, then suffer him to pass by to unlade his ships, and bring back into battell the flower of their foot Army, and also Hamilcar himselfe, who at that time was very formidable. Observing therefore the Enemies ships as they passed by with full faile, he setteth forth out of the Haven, and to encourage his men. causeth himselfe to be carried into the Admirall-Gally, having not recovered the use of his limbe figne of battell being given on both fides, Q. Valerius performed the Office of Gene-Eutropius rail, by reason of C. Lunatus his infirmity, not suffering to supply the place. The fight last-ed not long before it plainly appeared on which side the Victory inclined; for the Roman ships being light and nimble, did on every fide, at their pleasures assault the Carthaginians, being heawy, and almost immoveable; they were likewise in every thing else superiours, being taught by experience to avoid and amend whatfoever heretofore they had found inconvenient, and harme- Polyb. 1.61. full: Their ships were built after the best fashion, they had carefully laid aside all lumber which was of no use in fight, their Rowers were lusty, and well trained up, and they had a very confiderable strength of Legionaries; All these were very great advantages toward the Victory. On the other fide, the Carthaginian ships were heavy with burden, their Rowers newly leavied, and their men negligent, as being in security; for they had hoped the Romans would no more have tried their fortune at Sea. Therefore, as it must needs be, where the difference is so great, the Victory was not long in obtaining, the Carthaginians loft an hundred and twenty ships, seventy Flores whereof were taken, with all the men, to the number of ten thousand, the rest upon an happie Polyb change of winde in the time of fight, escaped to Hierone (us. Of the Europ. Roman Navy twelve ships were lost. Tis reported that from the beginning of the fight a fiery meteor was feen in the aire, threatning as it were the Carthaginian Navy with it's point directed against it, prelignifying the event which presently ensued. Hanno, with the rest of the ships which escaped out of the Fight, except thole which fled to Lilybaum, returning to Carthage, Orofin. was put to death for this his Misfortune. C. Lutarius the Conful went to the Army before Zonarate Lilabaum, where, while his wound was in cureing, he fpent his time in takeing an account of the ships, and Captives, and ordering how they should be dismissed. Thence he went to growing Eryx, where he fought Hamilear with good fuccesse, having slain two thousand Carthaginians. The Carthaginians at home understanding what a great Overthrow they had received, Polyle though their spirits were great, yet found that they wanted strength and meanes, to renew and carry on the War. For they were not able, so long as the Romans were Masters at sea, to supply their Army at Ernx with necessary accommodations; and, if that Army miscarried, they knew not where to raise any more souldiers, or find a Generall they durft confide in. Being Gornel, mpos by this Necessity driven into despair, they sent to Hamilcar, empowering him with full Commis. The mention of Peace was not unwellcome to the Confull, for being now shortly to lay down his Office, he could not by any meanes hope for the obtaining of a greater Glory, then that, of having finished the War; and to transmit that to his successour which was in his own power to accomplish, and most properly belonged to him, he thought both unleasonable and unadvised: He was the more forward, as Polyb. being very well confcious of the wants of the Common-wealth, and that he thought it fit his Countrey, after so many yeares continuall labour, should enjoy some rest. Wherefore after a long dispute of Articles on both fides, it was agreed, that the Carthaginians should totally depart Sicily; that they should not mage war against Hiero, and the Syracusans, or any of their

'Twas added, that these Articles were firmly concluded if the people of Rome would agree thereunto.

But it could by no means be obtained (though the Conful earnestly infifted upon it) that the fouldiers within Eryx should relign up their Armes; Hamilcar protesting, That he would rather sacrifice himself and his country to destruction, then yield to such a disgrace: Nevertheleffe he condescended, That every man at his departure thence should pay eighteen pence. The Carthaginians, so they might have peace, refused nothing; Hamilear, before the Articles were sworn unto, laid down his Command and went to Lilybaum, and from thence to Carebage, having approved himself, without comparison, the most excellent of all their Generals in that War, both in Courage and in Counsel. After this manner was managed and finished the first Carthaginian War, which lasted for four and twenty years with various chances and great losses, but to the greater damage of them who at last proved Victors. Polybius 1.63. For they who have made a particular Account, report about five hundred Carthaginian ships to have been loft, and seven hundred of the Romans, which is a great argument of the Romans Constancy and Resolution, that, not regarding so many losses by fight, or shipwracks fuftained, they did yet with patience bear and overcome the power of their Enemy, the frowns of Fortune, the tedious labour and pains, and the poverty of their Trea-

After this the Government of C. Lutatius the Conful was prorogued, that he might fettle affairs in Sicily; thither likewife was fent his brother one of the new Confuls, 2. Lutatius C.F. C.N. Cerco, whose Colleague was A. Manlins T.F.T.N. These did by their wildom order the Province, and fetled all things in peace and quiet, defiding all contro-verties and taking away all causes of quarrels and tumults, which after so great motions and alterations were unavoidably remaining. They difarmed all the sicilians who adhered to Hamilear, as likewife the Gants who had revolted from him, furthermore the Gants were commanded to depart out of the Roman Empire, because, besides other offences, when they were in the Garrison on the top of Mount Eryx, they plundered the Temple of Venus. The Sicilian Cities according to their several abilities were forced to pay Tribute and Custom; and it was made a Province, whither a Pretor was sent to command and go-

In the mean time Embassadours came from Carthage to intreat, They might redeem their Captives, and by Order from the Senate they were all restored without Ransome, as many as were in Publick custody; they who were prisoners to private men were redeemed at a certain rate, the greater part whereof was by command of the Senate paid out of the Treasury. But un-Orefue. 4, 10 lucky accidents at home did much diminish the joy of the Roman people. The River Tibur Auftin de Civ. did this year flow higher then ordinary, and filled all the lower parts of the City with large Pools of Water. Many buildings were by the first force thereof washed to the ground, and others, having their foundation rotted (for the Inundation continued many dayes) after the fall of the water, did much decay.

After this there happened a greater calamity by Fire, which fuddenly beginning in the night Val Max. 1.4.4 time, and running through many freets of the City, destroyed an incredible multitude of houfes and men; and, not content with private harmes, confumed all the buildings in the whole Circumference of the Forum. Himfelf having his Arme half burnt and his Eye-fight spoiled, beside the comfort he received from his good act, was eminently rewarded by the people of Rome, who Decreed, That as often as he went to the Senate he should be carried in a Chariot, which from the Foundation of the City was never granted to any man before.

In the mean time Q. Lutatius the Conful, with his brother Catulus and Q. Valerius the Proprator, having settled affairs in Sicily returned home to the City and made each of them their Triumph ; C. Lutatius Catulus on the fourth of the Nones of October, and & Trium. Capital Valerius on the day before the Nones of the same moneth. There was a memorable strife between these two concerning the Triumph of Valerius; for Lutatius his Triumph being without dispute agreed upon, & Valerius contending that his pains and labour were equal in the Victory defired the like honour as he had undergone the like care and danger. Catalus on the other fide alledged, That the leffer authority should not be equalized with the greater in the distribution of honours.

The question being hotly argued, Q. Valerius challenged Catulus to stand to arbitration, Whether or no the Carthaginian Navy were not overcome by his conduct? Catulus refused not to answer him; whereupon Atilius Calatinus was chosen Arbitrator , who asked Valerius , Whether the Conful' authority or the Pretors ought to have prevailed in cafe they had diffented in Agellius 13.14 their confultation about fighting? and in cafe their Auguries had been different whether of the two Valer. Maxim. oneht to have been followed ? To which when Valerins answered, That in both cases the Conful's anthority ought to have prevailed above the Pretor's; Calatinus not expeding till Catulus Spake, paffed sentence on his side. But Q. Valerins, though he was cast by the judgment of the Arbitrator, did yet obtain liberty to Triumph, his virtue and courage having been very famous in that War. This year C. Aurelius Cotta, and M. Fabius Buteo being Cenfors, made the nine Pighii Annals and thirtieth Luftration. There were numbred two hundred and threescore thousand Citizens; Euseb.num. two Tribes being superadded, the one called Velina the other Quirina, the number of Tribes 772 was made up five and twenty, and so continued. Sieily being now wholly subdued, as much Livie Equi 19 as belonged to the Carthaginians, and peace with them concluded, all things feemed not only quiet but very fafe and secure; when behold a sudden war, arising from whence it was least feared, did for a few dayes aftonish all Italy both with the terror and fear of an Intestine broil, as likewife with wonder at the speedy dispatch and issue of it.

The Falifei, I know not upon what account, grew fo mad as to rife up in arms against the Eutrepius b. a Romans; but the Confuls being fent with the Legions quelled them within fix dayes, and re-Livie Ep. t. duced them to fubjection. In the former battel, for 'tis reported two were fought, the Vi- Poht. t. 6. Gory was doubtful, for their foot prevailed though their horse were routed. But in the latter Zonaras the victory being on the Romans side complete, caused the Falises to humble themselves and beg peace, having loft fifteen thousand men: upon their yielding they were fined with the Tournation loffe of their arms, horfe, houshold-stuffe, servants and half their Territories. Their City in whose Zonaras ftrength they confided was translated from a craggy difficult place into plain open ground. The Val. Max. 6.5.3 people of Rome were meditating a more fevere revenge, out of anger against a City which had so often rebelled, but restraining their wrath by the advice of Papprius who had written the form of submission by the Consuls own command) That the Falisti submitted not to the Power but the Faith of the Romans: And so much did the facred name of Publick Faith prevail with them all, that they adjudged the conquered party to no feverer punifiment then was agreed upon.
This was gave occasion to have this year ended with the Triumphs of the Confuls; 2 Lutatius Triumphed on the Calends of March over the Falifei, A. Manlins the fourth of the Nones of Fafti Capital.

Taly being now once more at Peace within it felfe, their Publick Pleafures, and Delights did likewise encrease with their Power and security. When the Roman Games were exhibited, C. Claudins A. P. F.C. N. Centhe, and M. Sempronius C. F. M. N. Tuditanus being Confulls, L. Livius Andronicus, in immitation of the Gracian Comzdies and Trajedies, reduced the Stage Plays, which heretofore were onely Satyrs into Fables, and feigned representations. The Magistracy of these Breshren was in another respect very memorable; in that they caused that Clift (which from them received the name of Publicius) to be made plain and even, for the more commodious passage of Carriages into Mount Aventine, whereas before the Rock in that place was craggie and almost impassable. They likewise built

Tasit. 2.49. 2. the Temple of Flora in the great shew-place, These things were acted at home, while all things were quiet abroad, onely there was a suspicion that the Gauls and Ligurians had a designe for War. That these Provinces therefore were affigned to the Confulls, and war then commenced with the Gauls, is rather a Conjecture, then a true History, there being no antient writer extant which accurately describes those things;

Livit. Epit. 20 This one thing is Certain, that a Latine Colonie was planted at Spoletium in Umbria. The next year allo tis eafier to say, there was no Peace because the Temple of Janus was not shut, then to declare where or with what successe the war was managed. And the Consulship of Q Mamilius Q. F. Q. N. and Q. Valerius Q. F. P. N. is hardly known by any other pat-Fafti Capitelini fage then that Ennint the firft Elegant Roman Poet was that year borne. But the year after, when Ti. Sempronius Ti. F. C. N. Gracchus and P. Valerius Q. F. P. N. Falso were Confulls, the Gallick wars brake out again, and the Ligurians a new Enemy, were then first invaded by a Roman Army. This Province sell to the lot of T. Sempronias. P. Valerius encounted the Gaules, at the first with ill success, having lost three thousand five hundred men: But, entring fight again he obtained a fignall Victory, wherein fourteen thouland Gaules were flain, and two thouland taken. But, by reason of the loss sustened in the former battel, the Consul was denied the honor of Triumph, especially seeing his prosperous fight was rather to be attributed to the Fortune of the Common-wealth, then to his wife management of the business. For after the first fight, understanding that assistance was comeing to him from Rome, he said, he had rather perish with all bis Army, then obtain Villory by the hulpe of others; and in this fury he cast himselse and the Roman Army into the hazard of a battell. T Gracehus had better and more happy success, for having overthrown the Enemy in a fet battell, he depopulated great part of Liguria; From thence he croffed over into Sardinia and Corfica, and bringing back a vast multitude of Captives, gave occasion to that proverb of Sardi Venales, whereby is fignified any thing that is plentiful, and at an underrate to be fold.

But to confess the truth, the Romans had at this time rather a good opportunity then a just cause of possessing Sardinia and Corsica. The Carthaginians after the Sicilian Peace, were involved in a very troublesome war with their Mercenaries, and reduced even to the utmost ex. Polyb. 1.65 tremity; whereupon other their Hirelings, who were in a Garrison in Sardinia, flew Bostar the Carthaginian Generall with all his men: Hanno being fent from Curthage to punish their Villany, they inveigled his Army into a fociety of Rebellion, and apprehending him, nailed him to the Cross, and having flain all the Carthaginians, they had possessed almost all the strong holds throughout the Iland, till upon a' falling out between them and the Sardinians, they were expelled the Iland and betook themselves into Italy. Then did they accomplish that which Polyb. 1.83. while they were in Sardina they could not, for at that time they had invited the Romans to the Dominion of that Iland: But being now present either by the importunity of their Entreatys. or by plainly demonstrating what an occasion was offer'd of encreasing the Roman Power, they prevailed with them to fail over into Sardinia. For it is a virtue of no ordinary strain, to ab. Polyb. 1.88. ftain from other mens goods when they may with ease be possessed, neither can covetous or ambitious men well or long diffemble their greedy defires: But 'twill not be amifs for the better Zoneras understanding of this business, to relate some foregoing circumstances. The Romans, that Polytius, 1, 83 they might gain the Reputation of Humanity, did in the beginning of this Warre, very much Cornel. Nepo. favour the Carthaginian cause. And, though they sent them no affistance as was defired, yet Hamilton. they refused to entertain the Uticans, or any others who revolted to them : They commanded Appian. spud their Merchants out of Sicily and Italy to accommodate the Carthaginians with all necessary Fulv. Hefia. Provisions, prohibiting all traffick with their Enemies; and gave licence of hiring men out of Zonaras Italy for this war. They fent likewise Embassadors, though in vaine, to compose the strife: A little Appian before there arose a controversie, because the Carthaginians had taken some Italian Merchants Polybiur. Zonaras, conveighing Commodities to the Enemy, and secured them in publick Prisons, and they had now Appian five hundred of them in chains, and having flain not a few, had cast them into the sea to prevent Zonaras the discovery of the thing; whereupon the Romans declared themselves agrieved, and began Poble to threaten War: But the Carthaginians restoring those whom they had in custody, so pacing discovering the state of the carthaginians restoring the property of the property of the state of the sta the Romans, that they in answer sent back without Ransom all other Prisoners taken in the Sici-Polyb. 128. lian war. Yet at length Ambition prevailed, with a defire to crush that People, with whom they Zonara. had for four and twenty yeares together waged war with various success, and foresaw, that unless Apian apua in time they prevented it they must be forced to fight again. Wherefore when the Carthaginians, Fulvium Urfi-(having against their wills lost Sardinia, and now finished their war with the Mercenarys) meditated Revenge upon the Authors of Rebellions and Revolts; the Romans laid hold of this oc- Polyb. 1.88 ditated revenge upon the Authors of Redelinons and Revolus; the Romain sign note of this oc. Whereupon the Carthaginians unwilling in an unseasonable time to undertake so Zanaras great a War, did not only quit Sardinia, but upon the Romans demand, added likewise twelve Polyb. hundred Talents of silver, to their former sine. This injury did most of all incense the minds of Palyb. 1.10. the Carthaginians, and is thought to be the only cause of that war which was soon after com- Cornel, repor menced, and profecuted by Hanniball. For Hamiltars constant Hatred of Romans (to which Hamiltar. the second Punique war is chiefly imputed) was not by any other meanes more hotly exasperated, or firongly fomented. But these things happened afterwards,

For the prime men of the Boil taking counsel secretly together, raised a vast power Polyb 2,21. of Transalpines against the Romans. In the mean time L. Lentulus the Conful, who had marched with his Army into the Ligurian Territories, obtained there a great victory. It was ordered therefore he should make a Triumph, which accordingly he did on the Intercalary Ides. Some Authors report, That these Confuls were the first who led the Roman army over the Eutropia Po, and that in divers fights were flain four and twenty thousands, and taken five thousands of the Sandlenger Williams and Insubrian Gauls. But I rather believe that the Po was crossed over and the Insu. M.S., quentians and Insubrian Grant their own Courty in the part Cellife composition. After this Hiero came to Rome to the great joy of the Romans, who entertained him with all the respect as besitted them to do, being a confederate Prince, having deserved much of them, and a companion in their greatest Victory. He bestowed on the people of Rome two hundred thousand

In the mean time the Boian Princes, confideing in the multitude of Auxiliarys they had from beyond the Alpes, fent to the Confulls demanding, That Ariminum with it's Territories, which without doubt of right belonged to the Gauls, should be restored them, otherwise a terrible and Destructive War Would ensue. The Confuls, having not drawn their forces together, durft not hazard those few they had in the fortune of a Battel, neither could they consent unto the Gaules their demand, they answered therefore, They should fend Embassadors to the Senate, to fignifie their minds. The Gauls accepted of the condition, and a truce was concluded on for some days, while the Embassadours could go and return again. The Ambassadours at Rome received a denial from the Senate, and greater preparations were made for this War, whereof there was afterward nouse, in asmuch as Fortune without the expence of Roman blood put an end to it ? While the Embassadoures returned, the Boians fought a fet Battel with their Transalpine Auxiliaries, upon this Occasion; The Auxiliaries without the knowledge of the Boian people, had marched as far as Ariminum, whence a suspicion arose, that their maine Errand was to polfels that Territory themselves ; the Boians therefore were so enraged, that having slain their Kings Ates and Galatus as Traitours, they endeavoured by force to expell these strangers out of their Land, whereupon a Battell was fought with much flaughter, and both fides being thereby much weakned; the Transalpines returned home, the Boians bought their Peace of the Romans with part of their Grounds. This war being fo quickly dispatched, the Consuls went into Liguria: where P. Lentulus, having in a fet Battel Overthrown the Enemie, led his Army through the whole Region, taking Castles, some by storme, some by composition. C. they much regarded Sardinia, but because they perceived the Carthaginian war would break cut again; which because they believed the sooner it was begun would prove the easier; (The Carthaginians having not well recovered themselves since the last war) they resolved to prepare themselves, and commence it as soon as might be. The Carthaginians, willing at that time to endure any thing rather then a Roman war, were hereupon fo terrified, that having once and again sent Embassadours in vaine, they did at length send ten of their Prime Nobility, most humbly entreating, That they might enjoy the Peace they had obtained. Nevertheless they could not receive any mild Answer; till Hanno the youngest among the Embassadours, but of an un-

These things being accomplished, and the Roman Armes laid down, as having no Enemy, the Temple of Janus was thut, an unufuall fight in Rome, and not feen, after the dayes of Numa, for the space of about four hundred and forty yeares. In which respect I account the City of Rome very unhappy, that being perpetually employ'd in great and difficult labours, could never obtain the fruits thereof. For, whereas no wife man wageth war but to procure Peace, this City after so many and great warres happily finished, sometimes could not obtain : but never could long keep Peace. For even then new Rumours of War, after a few moneths, were heard of, which bereaved them of the sweetness of that Peace, which they had scarce well tasted of. The Sardinians, who had lately been subdued, shake off the yoke, and the Corsicans brake out in Rebellion, and the Ligurians raised Tumults, even in Italy it selfe. Therefore L. Postbumins A.F. A.N. Albinus and Sp. Carvilius Sp. F. C.N. Maximus being Confuls had order Flor. 2. 3. to leavy new Armies, which being disposed of in three bodies to prevent the enemies from helping one the other , L. Posthumius affailed the Ligurians, Sp. Carvilius the Corficans, and P. Cormelius was defigned for Sardinia. This Iland being of a very unwholfome aire afflicted his Army with the Plague and other diseases, whereby many mortals with the Pretor also himself perished. Hereupon the Sardinians grew bold and high, but were soon quelled after the arrivalof Sp. Carvilius in a great fet battel; the Corficans were likewife fubdued by him. Henceforward a cruel hatred began to burn between these two people, but neither party being willing as yet to commence the war, they continued in a thew of friendship, rather because they did not fight, then that the peace was firm.

After this M. Pemponius M. F. M. N. Maino, and C. Papirius C. F. L. N. Malo being Confulls, had for their Provinces M. Pomponius Sardinia, and C. Papirius Corfica. In both places the Enemies gave back, betaking themselves into woods and craggy Mountains, defending themselves more by the scituation of Places then by Armes. Therefore M. Pomponius feeing it more hard to find the Enemy, then to overcome him, caused hounds to be brought him out of Italy, who by their scent conducted him to the men, whom he surprized like wild beasts in their dens, and kennells. C. Papirius, having overcome the Corficans, purfued them into the mountains, where both his labour and danger was very great, and many of his fouldiers perished either by thirst, or by the sudden incursion of the Enemy, till having found water and refreshed his Army, the Corlicans fearing the Islue hearkned to the Conful's counsel of submitting them-

While the Confuls were detained by these Employments,a General Assembly was called by M. Duilius. M. F. M. N. who was made Dictatour for that purpole; he nominated (. Aurelius L.F. C.N. Cotta for Master of the horse; there were likewise Censours T. Manisus T. F. T. N. Torquatus, D. Fulvius . M. F. D. N. Flaceus, but being not Legitimately made, they religned up their office. Writers doe to this year afligne the Original of a new Custome, not unworthy to be mentioned. There had been no divorce from the beginning of the City to this time, Sp. Carvilius Ruga first of all dismissed his wife because she was barren, being by the Censours bound in Oath, to Marry a Wise for procreation of Children. The people were much displeased not so much at the Novelty as cruelty of the things, for wives being joyned in a perpetual fociety of life, they thought it unjust and inhumane for any cause what loever to repudiate them. They likewise ever after hated Sp. Carvilius though he was of necessity compelled by the judgment of his friends to difmis his wife who was much beloved by him, and very agreeable in her Manners. From this time there was more knots in the Law, and more fuits in the Prætours Courts, then being invented the Marriage Cautions, of which cunning there was no need before Divorces were in use. This yeare likewise began a new custom concerning the Honours of their Generalls; C. Papirius perswading himselfe he had performed Actions worthy of a Triumph (having now at length firmely fetled Corfica) and being denied that honour by the Senate, he did toward the End of his Confulship make a Triumph in Mount Alban on the third of the Nones of March. It pleased many to imitate this Example when they were denied a Triumph to make one in the Albane Mount, henceforward he was present at all sports in a mirtle Crown in memory of the Action, that he had overcome the Enemie in the Mirtle Fields. All things being at quiet in Sardinia and Corfica, the Ligurians still held out, against whom were sent M. Aimilus L. F. Q. N. Barbula and M. Junius D. F. D. N. Pera, then Confulls. They, in their March understanding that the Gaules began to stirre, entred their Territorys with the Army. For they being incenfed and provoked by the Flaminian Law, the Romans feared left being Warlike, and angry men, they should raise any Commotions; it was therefore forbidden by the Magistrates to accommodate any Gaule with Gold or filver; for the Boians, and other Gaules by felling of flaves and other Commodities had gathered a great bank of Money, and a suspicion was raised, that it was for a RomaneWar. Wherefore being more incensed, 'tis said that they understanding the Consulls were designed for Liguria, did in private meetings conclude, while the Roman Armies were far abroad, to March up to and affault the City it felfe. But, being terrified with the coming of the Confulls, and not prepared to make head against them, they entertained the Romans with all shew of Peace and friendship, and . counterfeit Respects. The Consults likewise being contented they had prevented the War, fained another cause of their coming thither ; that through the Gallick Territories they might have a more commodious march to Liguria. The last year the Censours renounced the office; This year therefore 2. Fabius 2. F. Q. N. Maximus Verruscosus, and M. Sempronius C. F. M. N. Tuditanus made the one and fourtieth Lustration, While these things are acting in Italy and at Rome, a new war was occasioned with the Illyrians upon their ground. The Illyrians exercifing Pyracy, a cruell and greedy kind of theft, had taken many Italian Merchants coming out of the Haven of Brundusium and had slain some; at the first the Senate hearing this, among other complaints, did not much regard it. But the Pirates boldnesse encreasing by their impunity, and complaints more frequently and earneftly made unto them, they thought fit to fend Embassadours, to demand satisfaction; as also to plead the Issaans cause who had lately committed themselves to the faith of the Romans; for they inhabiting an Iland in the Jonian sea, were daily profecuted with all manner of injuries by the Illyrians, from whom they had revolted. C. & L. Coruncanii were fent on this Errand : While they were in their journey, Agron (the son of Pleuratus) King of the Illyrians, called Ardyai, to whom their message was directed, departed this life leaving a fon under age, by name Pinnens, and the Kingdom was governed by Tenta, Step-mother to the young Prince, with the advice of her friends : She being proud, and puffed up with Prosperity, having given Audience to the Roman Embassadours with some contempt, answered, That she would take care that the Romans should receive no publick injury from the Illyrians; but that it was not the custom of the Illyrian Kings, to prohibit private persons from making what gain they could by sea. Commeaning the younger could not restain his anger at this arrogant speech but using an unseasonable liberty, though not unjust, replied, But tis a custom with the Romanes, Teuta, to prosecute private wrongs with publick vengeance, and relieve the injur'd party; and we will endeavour by the affiftance of the gods. the wangemen, and related to the state of th balladors were departed, fent some Pirates after them, who slew Coruncanius the younger with Zonaras, part of his Retinue, burnt the Governours of thips with fire, and clap the rest in chains. Colemporus also the Embassador of the Islaans was slain by the same Pirates.

The Romans understanding these things, did erect statues of three foot long in honour of Appine 24. 6 Cornneaming the younger, and P. Janius, and decreed war against Tests and the Illyrians. Ten. Pline 24. 6 International Property of the Party of the P ta ignorant in government, having not learn't either by Reason or Custome to correct the Vices of her Faminine wit, behaved her felf as timerous in bearing the anger of others, as the had Zonaras been headlong in provoking it. Having therefore intelligence that a war was preparing against her, the promised, To restore those who were living, as for the dead, whom the Pirats had slain without her command, it lay not in her power to restore them. This Embassie (though it offered little satisfaction for so great injuries, yet because the Romans hoped to compose the Illyrian broils without a war) was entertained, only they required, That those who slew the Embasfadors should be delivered up to them.

The woman feeing the war, the so much fear d, to be deferred, out of the lightness of her mind returned from fear to her former insolence, denying to deliver up any one, and that the nearly below. might confirm her words with as much fierceness in action, sendeth forces presently to beliege Fasti Capitol. Iffa. Whereupon the Romans thought fit to make no more delay, but fent both the Confuls thither with land and sea forces; the Consuls were L. Posthumius A.F. A. N. Albinus, and Cn. Fulvius Cn.F. Cn.N. Centumalus. Cn. Fulvius had the command of the Navy confift- Polybins ing of two hundred thips ; L. Posthumius was General of the Legions. Then again Tenta , being terrified, fent Demetrius Pharius to the Confuls to crave Peace. And they agreed upon a Truce, In case the Illyrians would quit Corcyra which they had lately possessed. The Romans being gone to take in Coreyra, Tenta, as if all fear were now far from her doors, returned to her former counsels, and sent Deputies to besiege Dyrrachium and Apollonia. Others report, That Corcyra was not surrendred with the consent of Teuta, but by the private design of Polyhania Demetrius, who, knowing that he was secretly accused of some crimes before Teuta, thought by Dia spud betraying that place he was Governour of, to find a sure refuge and protection among ft the Romans Fulviume

The Illyrian Garrison was no sooner surrendred, but the Corcyrians by publick consent sub-Pebbus. mitted themselves to the Romans, seeing no other means lest for their safety, but to be protected against the injury of the Illyrians by the power of so illustrious a City. From Coresea the Conful failed to Apollonia; where he met L. Posthumina having wasted over his Army from Brundusium, which confisted of twenty thousand foot and two thousand horse. The Apolloniatæ greedily entertained the Romans, and committed themselves to their Faith. This being relieved they went to Dyrrachium, which prefently became the Romans: The Illyrians who had began the fiege thereof, running away for fear upon the first intelligence of the Conful's coming. With the fame hask alfo the Ardyzi were forced into subjection, and Embassadors came from divers Nations of the farthest Hilyrium with promise, To ebry their commands if they might be admitted into Friendsbip; in which number were the Parthini and Afintanes. Applan Demetrius Pharius was a great help and furtherance in these Atchievements, for being carried Illyric, up and down with the Confuls, he extolled the Strength and Integrity of the Romans, accused Zonaras; the Rashness and Inconstancy of Tenta; and some by reason and counsel, others by his authority he perswaded into a society and confederacy with the Romans. After this they steared Dia their course to Isia, and in their passage landing at many places, they took most Towns with Volybius out any great difficulty. Nutria was foutly defended by the Illyrians, and cost much blood zonarm before it was taken, some Collonels also and a Questor being slain there. The Romans grief Die for this was the leffer because they surprised twenty Vessels coming from Peloponnesus with money and great spoil. When they were come to Iffa it happened as it had done at Dyrrachiam, 2014 the fiege was prefently railed upon the approach of the Roman Navy: The Barbarians flying Polybini this way and that way into several places, except only the Pharians, who for Demetrius sake, Ap with the fafety both of body and goods, were received into protection, forasmuch as he was Folybius born in the fame Iland, and had the Government of it under King Agron. The news of these Polybins did diverfly affect the instable mind of Touta, sometimes dejected with fear, sometimes again very confident, as the confidered the occasion. For as the was possessed with fear when the remembred so many Towns taken and demolished, that the sea coasts were plunder'd and wasted. and other Illyrians who had revolted to the Romans, then Tenta began utterly to despair and thought of buying her peace upon any conditions whatfoever. At the beginning of the fpring therefore the fent Embaffadors to Rome, excusing what was past as being done by the Command of Agren whose Acts it was necessary for her to maintain. The Romans granted peace, not to her, who had no proper power of administring affairs, neither had deserved any favour at their hands, but to Pinnens the fon of Agron, on thele conditions, That he flould duely pay what tribute was imposed on him, that he should quit all Illyrium, some few places excepted, that he Should not fail beyond Liffus with above two Boats, and those unarmed. By this peace Coreyca, Pharus, Ifa, Dyrachium and the Afintanes became wholly the Romans; what else was under Agron his jurisdiction being left to Pinneus. Tenta either for shame or by the command of the Romans left off the Government of the Realm, which Demetrius undertook under the name Thus being ended the Illyrian Quarrel, and the Limits of the Roman Empire extended even to Greece; the Commonwealth on the other hand was perplexed, for the Gauls were ready to rife up in Arms, and the Carthaginians power did mightily encrease in Spain, which could not be established without great danger to the Romans. Hafdrubal the Son-in-law and fucceffor of Hamilcar, having revenged the death of his Father-in law, did, partly by Armes, but more frequently by his Wildom and Eloquence, wherein he excelled, reduce many Nations to the Carthaginian subjection; and built another Carthage called the New, in a gulf of the ica by a most commodious Haven. But the Gallick affairs being of nearer concernment, bin-dered for the present their designes against the Carthaginians: They endeavoured therefore to stop the proceedings of the Gauls by leagues and Covenants; They sent likewise Embassadors to Carthage and to Hafdrubal, warning them, To contein themselves beyond the River Iberus, and permit the Saguntines to enjoy their liberty, and live according to their own Laws. These things happened in the year when Sp. Carvilius Sp.F. Cn. N. Maximus and Q. Fabius Q.N. Maximus Verrucofus were again Confuls. About the same time L. Postbumius Proconful who wintered in Illyrium, fent Embassadors from Corcyca to the Ætolians and Achaians, declaring what he had done, For what causes the war was undertaken, with what success managed, and upon what conditions sinished. They were kindly entertained for a smuch as those Nations and all other the Grecians did vehemently hate the Illyrians by reason of the continual Pyracies exercised by them under Agron and Tenta.

The Senate hearing this, did allow of what the Proconful had done, and moreover decreed another Embassie in the name of the Commonwealth, to the Corinthians and Athenians, declaring, The people of Romes good affection toward them, and their equity toward all men. Hereby the Romans purchased great good will amongst those people, and the Corinthians forthwith decreed this honour to the people of Rome, That they should be Partners in the Isthmian Games, which was one of the four greatest Solemnities in Greece. They were chiefly moved hereunto because the Romans had set at liberty, as Apollonia and other Grecian Cities, so Corcyca likewife, which was a Colonic of the Corinthians; the Athenians also embraced the Roman Society, and decreed, They souls have the liberty of the Ciry of Attens, and of the Eleusinian Mysteries. In the mean time Cn. Fulvius Proconful made a Naval Triumph over the illyrians on the Calends of Quintilis, and beheaded the Illyrian Nobles whom he led in Triumph. This was the first Triumph over the Illyrians.

The next year P. Valerius L.F. M.N Flaccus, and M. Atilius M.F. M.N. Regulus being Confuls, the number of Pretors was doubled, and they thought fit to create four that they might fend some with command into Sicily and Sardinia. Amongst these M. Valerius was Pretor of Sardinia and Corfica, C. Flaminius of Sicily. At this time there was very great fear of a Gallick war, for twas reported that the Boians and Insubrians consulted not only one with the other, but with the Transalpine people, and had hired a great strength of Mercenaries of the Galatæ a people of Gallia. They used therefore not only ordinary remedies against this evil, but fuch as a fevere judge would by no means excuse, but that the love of ones Country makes some things pardonable which in themselves are horrid. For when (besides other prodigies they were terrified with) they found in the Sybills books, That the Gauls and Grecians Brenld one day possesse the City of Rome; That they might by craft avert the threats of the Prediction, by the advice of the Priests, they buried alive two Gauls, of each sex one, and likewise two Grecians a man and a woman, in the Beef-marker, that fo they possessing part of the City, might feem to have fulfilled the Prophecy. This was done when M. Valerius M.F. M.N. Meffalla and L. Apuftius L.F. C.N. Fullo were Confuls. This year, amongst other no considerable occurrences, was most of it spent in making preparation for the Gallick War. There was raifed a most incredible number both of horse and foot, toward this war all Italy in general joyning with the Romans. Q. Fabius the Historian, who was present at the transaction of these affairs, reports, There were in arms eight hundred thousand men. That the number of the Romans and Campanians amounted to the number of two hundred forty eight thousand and two hundred footmen, and fix and twenty thousand and fix hundred horsemen. All the other multititude were Italians. The Veneti also and Cenomanni afforded the Romans the help of twenty thousand men, who by frequent alarms and incursions might compel the neighbouring Boians to tarry to the defence of their own Country, and not join themselves with the other forces of the Enemy, because they refused to hearken to Termes of Peace which the Romans propounded. For the Veneti and Cenomani being perswaded to renew friendship with Rome, the Insubrians strebbs and Boians perfifted in Hostility; nevertheless their strength was not great, their Kings not daring to lead out all their armed men : but being forced to leave fome at home to defend their Countryes, with the rest (to wit, fifty thousand Foot, and twenty thousand Horse) they began their march through Etruria towards Rome.

In the mean time L. Amilius , Q. F. Cn. N. Papus. & C. Atilius M. F. M.N. had Sardinia and Ariminum, with the adjoyning Gaules for their Provinces. For the Sardinians being Zonara aggrieved at the perpetuall presence of a Prætor, with his Virges and signes of Authority did again move Tumules, but C. Asilins the Confull foon quieted them without any great diff. 111- 1016. 2.33 ty. L. Aimilius had more to do with the Gaules, having broken through Etruria, and marches ing to Rome. The Pratour of Etruria being not able to hinder their passage, overtook them at Poist 2.75. Clusium, and late in the Evening planted his Camp not farre from them. The Gaules invented Polyb. 2.23. a stratagem whereby to entice the Romans out to battell. In the dead of the night they march Peryb. 1.5. ed with all their Foot to Fasule, leaving the Horse behind with instruction at break of day only to shew themselves to the Enemy, and presently betake themselves to the Foot Army, where should be reception for them in a convenient Camp, from whence likewife they would on the

The Romans were hereby deceived, and purfued the horse as if they had fled, and about Falu-Le were received by the Enemy, fresh and ready prepared, being themselves weary and void of Counsell, as in an occurrence not foreseen by them: Their only course was either by fight to defend themselves, or to sell their bloods at a dear rate : But the Gaules exceeding in number, befides other advantages, flew of the Romans fix thousand upon the place, and put the rest to slight. Diodorus 25 The Gaules endeavouring to take a fenced place upon an hill, (whither the greatest part of them which fled had betaken themselves) finding their strength to faile with their last nights march, Polyb. the dayes fight, retired to cure and refresh their bodyes, leaving a party of horse to besiege the hillock, not doubting to reduce it into their power the next day, either by force or composition. In this very nick of time came L. Aimilius, rather to be wished for, then upon any reasonable ground expected. For upon the first newes of the Gaules setting forward, he was sent to Arimi- Polybius, 2, 23 num, to defend the Coasts upon the Adriatick shore, but hearing their intention was to march Polyb. 2.26 to Rome, he marched by very great journeys from Ariminum, and by good luck came to this very place, and pitched his Camp not farre diffant from the Enemy, The belieged feeing fires in the night time from that part, judging, as was true, that the Roman Army was come, fent out some of their men unarmed, that they might the easier pass the Enemies Guards. The Confull by them understanding the state of Affaires, without any long deliberation, which the time would not permit, at break of day fet forward with his horse to the Hillock, giving order to the Tribunes to follow him with the Legions. The Gaules likewife were informed by the fame fires, that the Romans were come, and entred into counfell concerning the present affaires. King Aneroestus advised, that they should not encounter the Enemy, nom their fouldiers were leden with rich spoiles, but to return home, and lay aside their plunder, and then, if occasion were given of fighting, to return empty and nimble. Every one approving the counsell, they departed before night taking their journey through Erruia, by the fea fide. L. Aimilius having taken in those who fled to the hill, and having intelligence of the Enemies march, would not fight him in a fet battell, but resolved to follow them, laying hold of what opportunity time should afford.

In this conjuncture of Affaires fortune once more dispenced an unexpected accident. The other Confull C. Atilins arriving at Pifa from Sardinia, and there landing his Army. marched toward Rome. along the very fame Eirurian shore where the Gaules were returning. To array the Army as well as the ground would permit, and lead their Regiments in a square body, and a flow march: Himfelfe, observing a piece of high ground, opportunely overlooking the way the Gaules must of necessity pals, set forward with a Party of horse to prepossesse it. For he made what hast he could to fight the Enemy, being assured, if he were any thing worsted, to here-lieved by his Colleague, if his undertaking succeeded, to carry away the chiese Glory of the Victory. The Gaules feeing a troop of Enemies in the higher grounds, conjecturing it was a party of horse, sent round about in the night time by Aimilius, sent out likewise some of their own horse, with the affistance of some light armed men, to open the passage. But being informed that the other Confull was come, he was forced to array and marshall his foot, with their faces each way toward the Enemy, having in the middle their backs joyned one to the other: For they faw C. Atilius before them, and well knew that L. Aimilius followed them behind. Against L. Aimilius they placed the Transalpine Mercenaries, in the front (who from their wea-Pons are denominated Ga (ata) behind these, for a reserve, were the Insubrians. Against Ailius were opposed the Tauriscans and Boians. The Waggons and Carts were placed as a rampire Livic. 26.6.4, about each Wing: all their plunder, with a fufficient guard, was laid afide upon a neighbouring Orofiu 4.13. hill. Polybius.

The fight was now begun at that hill which C. Atilius had possessed, whereby L. Aimilius conjectured that his Colleague was there, of whose journey he knew nothing certain, only he heard that he was arrived at Pifa. Taking Counsel therefore on a sudden he commandeth some of his own horse to ride to the place of fight. There the horse on both sides had a very hot encounter wherein C. Acilius the Conful was flain, and his head carried to the Gallick Kings: Diolorus b. 25 At length the Romans fighting with all might and main, kept the place, and repulsed the ene. my. The Horse-fight being thus managed, the Foot charged each the other. There was to be seen a very terrible encounter, as for the number & strength of both parties, fo for the strange ordering of the Battel; for the Gauls being included between twoRoman Armies turned their faces on each fide to battel; it being very doubtful whether this posture were a greater advantage to them, in that (having to deal with two enemies) they kept their Rear fecure, and were of necessity compelled to fland to it having no way to flee; or that it were a greater disadvantage to be hemmed in by two Confular Armies. But the Romans were partly terrified with the very aspect of the men who flood in the front, with sterne countenances and vast bodys; partly encouraged not only with the iweetnesse of praise, but of plunder also, for among the former ranks of the Gaules there was not a man, but gliftred with golden bracelets and arme ftrings,

The fight being begun, the light armed men made a great flaughter of the Enemie, especially where the Gasata stood, who in a barbarous oftentation had flung away their garments and fought naked in the front. For the gallick sheilds being long and narrow not able to cover the whole body, they stood like so many marks exposed to the Roman darts: and they fell without revenge, being not able to firike the enemie, not to come to pel mel with light armed men-Wherefore growing desperate some runing rashly upon the enemie were killed with darts before they could come to handy-stroks, others by degrees retiring backward disordered their own Battel. The Gasata being thus vanquished by the light-armed menthe compleat armed did on every fide charge the Boians, Insubrians, and Tauriscans and slew a great number, neverthelesse the enemie stood with resolute minds, being in nothing inferriour but in their weapons; for neither did their sheilds defend their bodys, neither did their swords much offend the Romans, for being made only to hacke and hew they had no good poynts; they were likwife made crooked at the first blow, and unfit for a second, unless they be straightned againe by your foot on the ground. The Romans having already the better, were affured of the victory by the returne of the horse, who, having put the Gallick horse to slight, riding down the hill made an impression upon the slank of the enemie, so much the more irresistible as coming from the higher ground. After this manner Polybius discribeth the Battel of the Gaules in Etruria; from whome others with little reason do dissent. For who can easily believe, that the Gaules were compelled by a tempest to fly in the night time searing the anger of the Gods? And that C. Atilius setting upon their Rear was slaine? That afterward, each party for some dayes kept within their defences, L. Aimilius fought happily with them ? neither are they any more to be credited, who relate the Battel as fought not on the fea Coafts, but, in the Aretine Terris tories. There is no quellion made but that fourty thousand Gaules were then flain, little leffe then ten thouland taken, with Concelitarus one of their Kings : the other King Aneros fine who was of greater reputation for power and courage, escaping with a small company, in his flight cut the throats of all his Kindred and his own also. There was great plunder found, which the Conful caused to be restored to those from whom it was at first taken, every master owning his own goods. Then marching with his own Army and that of Atilius, through Ligaria into the Boians Country he gave it in plunder to his fouldiers as a reward of their pains taken, and they in a few dayes being sufficiently laden with spoils, he returned to Rome, to the greater joy of all, because the war was formidable. Scarce any mans Triumph was ever so much celebrated with acclamations of the people; being otherwise of it self very gallant and memorable as for the glory of his noble performances, fo for the number of the Captives and the worth of the spoils. There were many military Ensignes, and abundance of gold Chains and Bracelets, the ornaments of valiant men amongst the Gauls. But all menseyes were cheisly intended upon Britomarus and the other Gallick Princes, whom Aimilius by way of fcoff led girt and armed into the Capitol, as if thereby he tooke care they should fulfil the vow they had made, Never to unloofe their girdles or Belts, till they had ascended the Capitol. L. Aimilius made this Triumph over the Gaules on the third of the Nones of march. This year was made the one and fortieth Lustration by the Cenfors, Q. Claudius Ap. F. C.N. Centho and M. Junius D.F. D.N. Pera. The fear of the Gallick war was over, but the defire of revenge remained, and both the next years Confuls had Gallia for their Province; the Confuls were T. Manlins T F. T.N. Torquatus and Q. Fulvius M.F. Q.N. Flaceus again. The people chearfully decreed them Armies and whatfoever accommodation belongeth to the Commencing or profecuting a War. For it was hoped, that after so great a victory, they might easily drive away the Gauls from about the Po if they minded their business. The Consuls being gone with their Armies presently terrified the Boians into submission; their expedition afterwards was not so quick by reason of the Pestilence and so many showrs which fell. Others affirm, That these Consult croffed the Po, and in a fet battel overcame the Insubriant that they slew three and twenty thousand and took five theusand. But I rather follow the authority of Polybius in these as-

In the mean time because the Consuls being in a far Country, and were hindred either by a-Aion, or by showres, so that they could not return to the general Assembly: L. Cacilius L. F. Fifti Capit. C.N. Merellus was Created for Dectatour, who confecrated for Mafter of the Horse M. Fabius M. F.N. Buteo , by the Affembly, and Flaminius C.F.N. and P. Furius Sp. F. M.N. Philus were made Consuls. These as I think were the first Romans, who making an invasion into the Insubrians Countrey, crossed the Po with their Army, where the River Padusa falleth Liv. Epin. 20. into the Po.

This boldness cost them much labour and some blood; for in their passes over the River, and while they pitched their Campes, the enemie fiercely falling in upon them flew a confiderable Zonaras number. The Romans trouble and care upon this News, was mightily encreased by many Pro. Platarch, Mardigics related, as that in the Picenian Territories, a River ran blood, that in Etruvia the skie ed.c.4. was seen to burn, that at Atiminum in the night time light appeared, and three Moones were seen at cel.c.4. the fame time; also a Vultur was faid to fit many dayes together in the Forum at Rome, For though Zonaras about the fame time Caria was shaken with an Earthquake, and the Rhodian Colossus fell down, Marianus, these things were not thought to concern the Romans at all : Concerning the other Prodigies, Orofice the Augurs being asked their advice, answered, that the Confuls were not rightly chosen, where- plutarch. upon letters were fent after them to recal them back to the City. In the mean time the Confuls Zonaras. having made a Truce, had quitted the Insubrians Countrey, and afterward having raised Auxi- Polybius. liaries in the Countrey of the Cenomanni, had again began to infeft the gounds lying under the Strab, b.5.p. Alpes; whereupon the Infubrians enraged with anger, carried into the field the golden enfignes (out of the Temple of Minerva) which were called Immoveable, because it was not lawful to Hir them but in the time of Extreem Necessity; and had now met the Romans with Livie, 22.63, an Army of fifty thousand men, ready to enter battel. At this very time came the letters from the Senate. C. Flaminius either gueffing at the fubliance of the letters, or being pre-informed Zonaras by his friends, perswaded his Colleague, not to open them before buttel.

Being resolved to fight, they consulted about their Mercenary Gaules, lest if they were negletted, they might have cause to quarrel; and if admitted to the fight, they might have occasion of doing barm. For they feared their inconstancy, especially fighting against Neighbours and Kinfmen. At last they thought fit to place them on the other fide of the River, where the bridges being beaten down, they neither could do any harm to the Romans, nor have opportunity to flie but to truft in their courage: After a sharp dispute the Romans obtained the Victory to the greater praise of the Tribunes then the Confuls. For C.Flaminius had ordered the Battel fo near the brink of the River, that there was no space left to receive the Troupes in case they had been forced to Retire; which without doubt would have proved the ruine of the whole Army. But the Tribunes having had experience by former battels, that all the Gallick Valour conflitteh in the first charge, which is very hot, but short, and if the brunt of it be once borne, there is no more to be seared from them; did divide the spears of the Triaris among the first ranks, that with them they might receive the first onset, and afterward flinging them away, draw their Swords when the fight began; the Gallick Swords were presently blunted, and made crooked at the first stroke upon the (pears, and while they were buse in making them straight, the Romans advancing with their drawing Repiers, took from them the use of their Weapons: For this inconvenience is in the Gallick Swords, that being made only to hack, some time is required in lifting up the hand, and preparing for the stroaks, which if it be denyed . they are of no use: But the Romans thrulting with the point could do their business in a moment and so pressing forward to the bodies of the enemies, they did securely thrust them into the face

Tis reported that nine thousand Gaules were slain, and double the number taken. After the Orosius 4:15 Victory, they spoiled the grounds round about, and gathered much Plunder. Then at length they Plunareb. Marthought fit to read the Senates letters, the contents whereof Philus was ready to obey: But C. ethe. 4. Flaminius infilted, that this was the envy of some Senators, and not the fault of the Auspices, 2011aras whereof there could be no more certain argument, then the Victory they had obtained; he faid also he would not return till either the War was finished, or his Magistracy expired: adding moreover; that he would cause the Romans to leave off the foolish observation of Augurier, and such other fopperies. Nevertheless P. Furius persisting in his resolution, the Army of Flaminius. fearing that after his departure they should not be very safe in the enemies Countrey, perswa- Liv. 22.6,3: ded him to tarry for some few dayes; but he did utterly abstain from all actions; Flaminius Zonaras taking in the mean time some Casties, as also a City of no small renown among those people The spoiles he gave to his fouldiers, to prepare their minds for his defence in that quarrel he Liv. 21.63. knew would arise between him and the Senate. This City indeed was so moved with indignation, that none went out according to the cultome to meet the Confuls, and not only Flaminius but Plutareh for his sake Philus also was denyed the honour of Triumph. At length Flaminius by the Zonaras. peoples favour entred the City triumphing on the fourth of the Ides of March. Many Liv. 23.14. rich spoiles were to be seen in that Triumph: Great store of Armes, and chains of Gold, out of which Flaminius dedicated a Token of Victory to Jupiter in the Capitolium, Florus, 2,4,4 inverting the Gallicks Vow, who had promifed out of the Romans spoiles to dedicate a Chain to Mars. Afterward the other Conful triumphed over the Gaules, and the Ligurians on the fourth Colum. Capitol. of the Ides of March. The Senates ill will being hereby rather intended then overcome, did Plutareb not cease till they were both forced to disdain this their second Triumph : about the same time. Livie. 26.33.8. by the like feverity, two very eminent persons were deprived of their Priesthood, M. Cornelius Cethegus, because he had not aright laid open the Entrailes, and Q. Sulpicius, because in the time of facrifice his cap fell from his head. When these Confulls time was out, the Assembly was held by an Interiex, where M. Claudius M. F. M. N. Marcellus being made Confull, affumed for his Colleague C. Cornelius. L. F. L. N. Scipio Calvus. These Confulls denies Peace to the Insubrians though they petitioned for it, M. Marcellus chiefly refusing all Conditions, out of his defire to Triumph. And the Gaules themselves seemed to meditate war rather then Peace, for having a new hired thirty thousand Gefata, and overcome the Alpes, they had gathered together a far greater number of Infubrians. The war being thus begun, the Confulls fet out in the beginning of the spring, and belieged

Accerta, a Town between Po and the Alpes. It feeming difficult to drive the Romans from the fiege, Britomarus with ten thouland Galata, resolved to go forth, and waste the Regions about Po, which the Confulls understanding, fo divided their Forces, that Cn. Cornelius might with part of the Army profecute the fiege, while Marcellus with two thirds of the Horle, and a choice company of light armed men, went about to fuccour and defend their Affociates. Having chosen the lightest and nimblest, not above fix hundred, with these and his Horse he marched day and night toward the Enemy, whom having overtaken at Classidium, he presently encountred before he could refresh his men, not of his own good will, but forced by the fury of the Gafata, who being superiour in number, and arrogating to themselves the mastery in horsemanship, hearing the Consull had brought but few foot along with him, left off their siege of Clastidium, and forthwith four'd on to crush him. Marcellus, having drawn out his battell at length, that he might not be encompassed by the multitude of his linemies, marched forward to meet them. Their bodyes were now not far afunder, when the Confull intending to begin the Charge, his Horse affrighted with the clamour and shouts of the Gaules, started at de and carried him back. The Confull fearing least this accident being esteemed an ill Omen should daunt the courage of his men, as his horse wheeled about he adored the Sun, as if he had turned about his Horse for the same purpose; according to the antient custom, men using to turn themselves about when they worshipped the Gods: Tis reported, that before the first onset, he vowed to Jupiter Ferential the fairest of the Enemies Armes; And presently copying Britomarus in the head of his Troopes, his atmour glistering with Gold and Silver, and other colours, he judged these to be the Armes which he had vowed. The King also, having feen the Roman Generall, advanced far before his men, and by voice and gesture challenged him to Combate; M. Marcellus accepted, and immediately having run him through the breftplate, wounded him with the speare, and with the force of his horses Careere tumbling him to the ground, reiterating his strokes he slew him in the place, whereupon leaping off his horse, and holding the armes in his hands, he lift up his eyes to heaven, faying, Infiter Feretrius, who beboldest the deeds of Valiant Commanders in battell! Behold, I the third Roman, as thy selfe canst winns, a Ceneral bassing Rain a Generall of the Enemies, doe conservate the Royall spoyls unto thee: Doe thon suffer our affaires prosperally to succeed oven to the issue of the Wars. Marcellus taking horse again, they entred battell with all might and main, the Romans sighting most couragiously; the Confull's boldness and good Fortune having filled them no less with Valour for the Encounter, then with hopes of Victory. Wherefore neither the Gallick horse nor yet the Foot which came to their reliefe could endure the brunt; fo that a few men, which is rarely seen, carried away the Victory from a numerous Army. The spoils being gathered up the Confull returned to his Colleague, who having taken Acerra where he found great store of Corne, being now about Mediolanum, had much adoe to defend himselfe from the Enemy, for while he was busie in the siege of their strongest and most populous City, the Metropolis of Insubria, they had as it were round belieged him with great multitudes: But Marcellus his approach quickly alterred the Scene. For the Gasata being informed of their Kings death, went away, and Mediolanum being by them forfaken, was not able to defend it felfe. So that many of the Insubrian forces being flain, Mediolanum, and after that Comum taken, the other Cities together with the whole Nation submitted themselves to the Romans, being fined in a summe of money, and part of their grounds, having otherwise good Conditions of Peace. M. Marcellus Livis, Epil. 20 being returned home, made a most illustrious triumph over the Insubrian Gaules, and the Germans on the Calends of March. This is the first mention of the Germans in the Roman Hiftory, who being hired, came from the Nations beyond the Rhens, under the conduct of Virdomarm, their Generall, These and the Gallick Captives, men of vast stature of body, with other rich spoiles were led before the Triumphant Chariot. The Consult followed, with the rarest spectacle, carrying the armes of the flain General to Jupiter Feretrius; after him marched his fouldiers harneffed with glittering Armes, making shouts, and Military Acclamations. In this order being come to the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, M. Marcellus descending from his Chariot, dedicated his Royall spoils to Jupiter, being the third after Romulus and A. Cornelius Coffus, Livie 1.10. 9. who had done fo, and after him no man ever did the like. The people of Rome beheld these Armes with the greater pleasure, in that the Enemies were faid to have vowed the Roman Armes to Vulcan. So great was the Joy of this Victory, that the Romans out of the spoiles, sent a Golden Cup to Apollo of Delphos, and of the Gallick Armes to their Affociate Cities round about. To Hiero King of Syracufe, belides some of the spoiles, they sent the price of that Corn he had accommodated them with during the Gallick War. After this a new enemy arose, Liv. 24.21.9. the Istrians who infested the Seas with Piracy, and had taken some of the Roman Cornships. Against these both the Consuls were fent, P. Cornelius, and M. Minucius Rufus, who brought into Europius 2 subjection many people either by force or composition. Nevertheless I do not find that these Confuls Triumphed; perhaps because their Victory cost so much Roman blood. This year a- Zonaras rose a Starre in Spain destructive to many Cities and Nations; to wit, Hannibal the successor of Haldrabal, of whole beginnings and proceedings ye will shortly read more from a greater Orofius

In the mean time the new Confuls L. Veturius, and C. Lutatius marched to the Alpes with their Army, but making more use of Treatyes then Armes , they joyned many of those people with their own good liking to the Roman locietie. At this time the Illyrian War was renew'd by Zonaras Demetrius Pharius his fault, against whom many complaints were made, in as much as under pre-tence of the Roman friendship, he had vexed and afflicted the neighbour Cities according to his pleasure. For being by the Romans invested with power, because he had revolted from Tenta and having the Trition of K. Pinnens whose mother Tritenta he had married, he behaved himfelf like a King, and grew very heavy and intolerable both to the people of the Countrey, and duffining to Neighbouring Regions. He endeavoured likewife to bring under his own Dominion, 19.1.1. the people of Illyricum, the friends and affociates of the Romans, and moreover contrary to the league, he failed beyond Liffin with fifty Armed Veffel, to the llands Cyclades, fome of Polibins 3. 16 them he plundered, from others he exacted money, and had now drawn into his party, as mamy Atrians as fonce the late War Bore a grudg to the Romans, and forced the Acintanes to his Polybins 4, 16 side. Neither did he any whit fear the Romans, who being involved in a Gallick War, and fearing a Pwitch one, he thought had neither ftrength nor Liefure enough to revenge the Polybius 3. 16 Injuries of their affociates. And he promifed himlelf any favour from Philip Kings of Macedon, whom he had affifted in the Cleomenian War, being General of the Illyrick Auxiliaries: A War was therefore decreed against him, and preparations made. In the mean time L. Aimilius and C. Flaminus being Cenfours made the three and fourtieth Lustration, there were numbred Livie 23, 12.3. two hundred and seventy thousand, two hundred and thirty Citizens. A promiscuous multitude Livie Epit. 20 of Libertines being dispersed amongst the Tribes, had hitherto made great confusion; in imitation Livie 9.46.14 therefore of Q. Fabins Maximus, the Censours reduced them into four Tribes, the Efquiline, Livie Epit Palatine, Saburrane; and the Colline. C. Flaminius in the same Censourship fenced in the Cassidorus high way to Ariminam, and built a flew-place, both called by his name; The Flaminian flew Fiftur Voce place, and the Fluminian way. The fame Cenfors committed Matilia, of the Dyers trade, Circu Flam. to the judgment of the people; not thinking it to be beneath the dignity of to high a Magi- Plin, 35.37. firacy to enquire into petit things. About the fame time the Illirian rebellion caused the Senate to give the charge of that province to M. Livius M. F. M.N. Salinator, and M. Aimilius M. F. Phillips the Confuls. Demetrius on the other fide, was not flack in preparing himfel for the War, 'faving feat a trong Garrifon to Dimatus, and providing all necellaries for the Polyhing 3. 18, influening of a long flege. In 60the phases the gave order for the flaughter of the prime men, whole fidelity he milituded, and committed the Government to his own creatures. Out of the whole Kingdome he gathered a choice strength of fix thousand men, whom he kept with himself

In the mean time L. Paulus the Conful fetting forth in the beginning of the fpring, failed over into Iliricum, and understanding that the enemy put great hopes in the strength of Damains, Polybins 3, 16. which they thought impregnable; he rightly judged that it would firste much terror into them, in case he should make himself Master of it: Assaulting it therefore with very much courage and cheerfulness, he took it by fterm in seven dayes time. Neither was the Conful deceived in his project, for the news hereof being spread into the neighbour Regions, messengers came flocking from every City, offering up themselves, and all their goods into the hands of the Romans. The Contul having received them into pretection, sailed to the lland of Phara, where Demetrial kept his Court. But understanding that it was well manned with a Garrison of Roir Soudiers, furnified with prevision of all forts; strong, both by scituation, and allo with artificial works, and guarded with the presence of the Tyrant himself; the Confutunwilfing to begin a tedious fiege contrived a firatagem of great use to the speedy effecting of Victo-

For fending over the greater part of his Army in the night time, with order to cover themfelves in woody Tracts; Himfelf app ears in open daty with twenty thips making towards the Haven, whereby he drew out the Phanians, among whome was Demetrius himself, to hinder his landing. Upon the first engagement it hapned, as is usual, that many more by degrees running to the fuccour of their friends, the City was left almost naked of Souldiers. In the mean time those Romans who had landed in the night time, taking their journey through covert. places possessed an bill even in the midst between the City and the Haven, thereby rendring it impossible for those who were come out of the Town to return safe back.

Demetrius observing what was done, tooke as good Counsel as in such a dangerous case could be; for declining the present skirmish, and calling his souldiers together, Valinatimen, fath be; for accuming the present saturity, and saming its possible so betaking themselves to fira-he, it appeares that our courage is formidable to the entmie; for, betaking themselves to fira-tagems, they declare little trust in their force of armes. They, have made use of the night season to ereep into this Illand, of which, if I be not deceived in you , they shall possesse no more, then poffessed of the Hill, and they as diligently ordering themselves sustained his charge, till they, who in the meane time had landed, coming upon his Reare utterly routed his whole body with great flaughter. Some few by flight escaped to the Town, others by blind paths slipt a-way. Demetrias who in certaine by-places had boates ready prepared for all adventures, getting aboard one of them fled to Phillip King of Macedon, by whom being entertained, he did by flattery, and Tyrannical advice corrupt the young man's manners, which before were laudable, and likwife was authour unto him of the Roman War and many other Calamities. After this fight Phares was taken; and by the Consul's Command plunder'd and demolished. The Illyrian affaires being afterward fettled to his own liking the Conful now at the end of Summer returned to Rome to obtaine his Triumph. In the narration of this War I have likewise chosen to follow Polibiu, being not ignorant that others attribute the glory of finishing this War to both the Confuls, who having summoned Demetrise to appeare before them, did, upon default, War with him in the lland of Isa by the same arts as I have related, and then taking Pharos by Treachery expulsed him out of the Dominions. Concerning whole end likewise they differ from Polybins, who lived neerer these times and these places; but those things as being after this time I shall passe by. But the Romans, for King Pinneus his sake, whose years declar'd him innocent of these defignes, did spare the illyrians, and renewed the league with him, with addition of some Articles. L. Aimilius made a most glorious Triumph over these people, and I find also and of the viris that (M. Livius Triumphed for this War, but melt writers mention it not; 'tis likely, being the caule the performances of L. Panius, being the more emittent, did obscure the glory of his and L. Paulus being out of Envy accused. That they had not equally distributed the spoils among the strengen at the soldiers but had converted many things to other uses, did undergoe the sentence of the Livie 32.36.3 people. L. Paulus hardly escaped, M. Livius was condemned by all the Tribes except only Livie 27:36.3 the Mecian, Which difgrace and indignity he took fo heavily, that departing the Citie, he avoyded all meetings, till the Commonwealth's occasions recalled him to his former course of life. But these things hapened in the Consulship of P. Cornelins Scipio and Tib. Sempronius Longus. But in the same year when M. Livius and Paulus were Confuls, one Archagathus the fon of Lylanias came out of Peloponnesas to Rome, who professing Physick was made free of the Citie, endowed with all the priviledges of a Roman, and had a shop bought for him at the Publick charge in the Acilian street. A thing not so much worthy taking notice of , but that then first was the name of the Medicinal faculty heard of and known at Rome; they having to this time preserved their healths by temperance and remedies not bought. In the same Confuls time Colonies were deduced to Placentia and Cremona in the Gallick Territories, Being none of the least causes of anger which moved the Boians and Insubrians to incline to Hannibal, who, now affaulting Saguntum with all might, did by the ruines thereof prepare his way to the Roman Wars. But these and other commotions, which in great number, and with no lesse Terrour and violence presently assailed the Romans, will the better be understood by relating foregoing Circumstances.

what they can cover with their bodys having payed for it with their lives. Only you, my * Country-men of Pharos, and young men of Illyrisum, be mindful of your Country, of your honour, and make the Romans know, twas neither their valour nor our cowardize, which gave them occasion once to Triumph at Rome over the Illyrians. It was not Fulvius or Post-bumins with all their Counsel and firength, but Tenta which conquered Illyrium by her fashness and impotence of affections. And, to omit other things, ye are not ignorant, that at that time their victory had not been fo easie, but that Tenta chose to have me rather her enemie then her Protector. But because I firmly trust to you, and the time requires rather deeds then words, I shall say no more. Ye have courage, ye have weapons, ye see the necessity, which is able to make a coward fight, danger is imminent both to your felves, and your Citie unless by your valour ye repel it. Let us on then and with happy fortune charge these men who are newly crept out of their hiding places: We shall do well enough with those who are landing: 'if we once overcome thefe, the others will flie to their ships in greater haft shen now they leave Having thus for the time encouraged his men, he leads them on to charge those who were
